THE MANILA PRISON.

A Returned Volunteer Tells of Its Past and Present.

Written for THE LEADER.

The penitentiary is situated in the north end of Santa Cruz district, Manila, and is a grand sight for one visit, or at least it must have been during the Spanish time. Passing through a well-guarded gate, you enter the Presideo, as the Spanish term it. The first building is occupied by the superintendent and his assistants. Looking in any direction you are facing the mechanical skill of the native prisoner in the form of chairs, cots, benches, vases, statues and paintings of various designs, all done by hand. Near this is a ward generally known or spoken of as the female ward of the general prison. There are cases here of women having been confined for fifteen or twenty years, suffering the shame and hardships of imprisonment rather than accept the advances of some lecherous Spanish officer or charity-fattened priest. Since the prison has been under American control nearly 1000 inmates have been released, among them 75 or 80 per cent of the females, whom the authorities found falsely imprisoned. The prison is divided into three parts, the general prisoners occupying the left-hand side, the military and Manila prisoners the right. There are two classes of military prisoners—the general and the garrison. The former class consists of those who have been dishonorably discharged from the service of the United States and are serving quite long terms. On entering the prison they are closely shaved. They are also marked with a letter "P" in three different colors. On first entering a red "P" is pinned on the prisoner; if he proves obedient and trustworthy a white "P" takes its place, but if, on the contrary, he is marked with a yellow "P" it deprives him of all liberties allowed prisoners of that department. The garrison prisoners are the enlisted men from different organizations serving terms of several months. When sentenced to two months or under the prisoner is kept in the regimental guard-house. He is not shaved, and is permitted to wear the clothes he brings with him. The other class detained on this side are known as civilians. The place is somewhat similar to our county and state jails. The longest time being served by a civilian at present is one year. The employment of prisoners on this side consists mainly in cleaning the premises. When there is nothing for them to do they are compelled to dig holes and then refill them, or are steadily drilled by non-commissioned officers detailed for that purpose. During the Spanish time the overseer was a man of great importance and authority. It was customary to hire out the prisoners of minor offenses to aid labor contractor who would be responsible for their safe return. From this source much revenue would annually roll in and help to fatten his monthly pay of 60 pesos (30 gold.)

From the gateway one passes the queer-shaped row of living apartments or cells, which are opened every Sunday morning and the short-term prisoners are allowed their liberty about the yard. On the farther end of the yard are the cells of solitary confinement. Here are evidences of cruelty on every hand. The cells are about ten feet square and are constructed of large oblong stones dovetailed together. Prisoners are often placed in these cells with no clothing on except, perhaps, breech-cloths. No beds are given them, and the food and water can easily be imagined.

The moss-covered walls of the penitentiary have withstood the burning sun and raging typhoon and witnessed the agony and suffering for many a year.
