A JUNE MORNING.

STANDING on the beach at Newport, just as the gray dawn makes familiar objects assume strange shapes, one realizes what "early in the morning" means. The bay---one smooth, irresistible, outward rush of water, still dark with the lingering shadows of departing night, carries here and there on its whirling eddies some small booty wrested from the shores during its bold night raid.

Next, the tones of light change, and beyond the eastern hills the sky begins to warm with those tints which man has for ages tried to describe and imitate with pen and brush and which he has never quite done justice to. Through varying shades of violet to palest mauve, then to a tender rose, ever deepening and brightening, until finally the bay is all one shining opal set round with emerald hills.

The beach is quiet and usually deserted at this hour. No surf foams in over the reefs. Rollers scarcely large enough to bob a surf duck steal softly in and play lazily with the long, ruffled kelp ribbons that fringe the rocks. Far in the west the sky line is yet dim, as if Night were looking over her shoulder at her pursuer.

Then the sunlight falls, warm and welcome, over the sands, and the various sea-birds greet it with joyous cries, though harsh, and the robins and meadow-larks up on the hill in the rhododendron bushes add their clear tones to the morning hymn of Nature. The air is full of a strong, briny odor, mingled sometimes with a faint, spicy fragrance, unrecognised, but wholly pleasing to the nostrils.

The silence, the peace, almost, I would say, the solemnity, of this early summer morning on the shore of the Pacific is something that once experienced can never be forgotten. The world, hurrying and worrying and elbowing its way in crowded city streets, seems to be blotted out, and the mind has room and time to look back on life as far as memory can carry it, and forward until it encounters infinity.

Let the "nerveless" man, broken down in the struggle for supremacy over his fellow in either the business or political world, come to this chosen spot and watch the sun rise over hill and bay and ocean, fill his lungs with deep breaths of pure, strong salt air, and I guarantee his cares to float away with the morning mists.

What better location could there be for a sanitarium than somewhere on the banks of our own Yaquina? Would not an earnest, combined effort in interesting capital in that direction by our leading citizens be better for the upbuilding of our county than discussion over the average rainfall, or who is going to "run" at next spring's election?

FELIX. YAQUINA, Or., Dec. 4, 1899.
