The Slums' Greatest Curse.

"The greatest curse of slumdom is unquestionably the low saloon, where men with manhood sapped away, and women trodden down into the very dust, gather night after night to laugh and dance and drink, flinging away their poor, blighted lives in reckless revelry," writes Mrs. Ballington Booth, in the February Ladies' Home Journal. "It is ghastly merry-making—laughter without sound of mirth, dancing without step of agile feet, and a drinking that maddens the desperate brain and burns the parched lips. I have spent hour after hour within these places, talking to the hopeless women, and the utter despair of their life is something never to be effaced from the memory of those who have seen the bitterness of the poor soul behind the mask of brazen indifference. I have never gone down into these shadows and come back the same. I have always felt older after each experience, and life has been sadder to me forever afterward. Had my purpose been that of sightseeing or of 'doing the slums' the cost would indeed have been too dear a one to have paid, and I would never have undertaken it. Perhaps what I have seen of child-life in the slums has made upon my heart the deepest scars. Poor little scraps of humanity, sick, puny and deformed, or what was even worse still, vile and evil in word and disposition before the baby accents had left their words! The streets swarmed with them, playing, quarreling, fighting amid the jostling crowd and traffic until late into the night, and the houses were full of little figures that slept on the floor or crouched in the corners to get away from the drunken and brutal, who delight in abusing the weak. In summer, Death's angel mows them down through the hot season as the scythe cuts the flowers amid the hay, and it has often seemed to me that on such a mission his black robes vanish and he is a veritable angel of light."
