A BACK VIEW.

By FELIX.

The Philosopher sat, as usual, in the sunny corner where the sea breeze did not make itself too evident, and the Satellites occupied the various planks and railings round about, each one in the position that habit and many sunny mornings had accustomed him to. No fear in this climate of a day's "shake" being the penalty for an hour's sunning.

Election was over and the Philosopher had just finished telling the Satellites why he "knew the result would be as it was," that he had "foreseen just how it would be, as soon as the nominations were made," regardless of the fact that only about one-eleventh of his predictions on sunny mornings previous to election had been fulfilled. Something to hold the interest of his audience was needed badly, and as the Philosopher is never at a loss for material for a short-order free-for-all lecture, he gazed pensively at Satellite No. 3, and said: "Did you ever notice how easy it is to read not only a man's character, but his trade or occupation, from the shape and carriage of his back and shoulders? Now, take the lazy man's back: one glimpse is enough (here the Sat's all managed to face each other quite squarely). It is rather broad, and the shoulders are bent somewhat forward, just with the burden of their own weight. The head, too, droops slightly forward, which gives a more round-shouldered appearance than is really true. The coat is always a frock, and always shiny across the rather fleshy shoulder blades.

"Then, there is the crank's back: it is straight enough, usually is somewhat hollow between the shoulders, and of these latter the left one is always a little higher than the right—all cranks are made like that, you know.

"You can tell the successful farmer from the unsuccessful just from the back alone, including the back of the head. The former is broader and squarer-shouldered, with no taper at the waist, while the latter seems to have been whittled away a little at each side just below the shoulder blades and the whole appearance of his back seems to say: 'I don't know whether I will plant my potatoes this week or next; and what is the use of mending that fence, the cattle may break it down again?'

"Then, again, you can easily see the difference between the shoulders that are rounded by carrying lumber and planing at the carpenter's bench and those of the man who swings the big hammer in a blacksmith shop, or the shoulders that are raised not rounded by sitting all day at a desk; and from the carriage of the shoulders the back gets its individuality. Take it right through, it is the square-shouldered, assertive-elbowed man who gets the jam to go with his bread and butter."

The Philosopher gazed reflectively over the heads of the Satellites and a far-off look grew in his eyes, as if he saw a long procession of backs filing away in the distance, each one giving him its life story as it passed. Just then a man whom they all knew passed the group, and they eyed him closely for proof of the Philosopher's words. Satellite No. 4 said: "Now you mention it, I can see all that fellow's trials on his back, and more than that, his triumphs, too, and it is the hardest thing to describe I ever tried my tongue at, but surely you can all see it."

The Philosopher said: "You never could fail in reading a back when once you had a key to the system."

Then, as the shadow of the warehouse fell across the sunny corner, he added that it was about time to bring that session to a close; and as he walked slowly away, there fell from the mouths of the seven Satellites, fourteen different readings of the Philosopher's back, and they were all more or less correct, too; but, then, you will always notice that peculiarity of Philosophers' backs when you get a key to the system.

A LIFE AND DEATH FIGHT.

Mr. W. A. Hines of Manchester, Ia., writing of his almost miraculous escape from death, says: "Exposure after measles induced serious lung trouble, which ended in Consumption. I had frequent hemorrhages and coughed night and day. All my doctors said I must soon die. Then I began to use Dr. King's New Discovery which wholly cured me. Hundreds have used it on my advice and all say it never fails to cure Throat, Chest and Lung troubles." Regular size 50c and $1.00. Trial bottles free at O. O. Krogstad's drug store.
