Nature Fakery.
(Spokesman-Review.)

John Kendrick Bangs goes any nature faker alive several better. He absolutely refuses to be put down and out by any product of the great and glorious northwest.

Under a Corvallis, Ore. date line, the following item recently appeared in this newspaper:

"A horse belonging to John Jacobs residing on route No 6 east of town swallowed a live hawk the other day while eating hay from a straw-stack in the pasture.

"The bird was not a large one and entered the animal's stomach alive. The strangest part of the affair is that the bird did not die immediately, but managed to peck its way through the lining of the horse's stomach and through the hide.

"The horse died and was found a few hours later by W. F. Carey, a neighbor, with the dead body of the hawk half protruding from the horse's stomach. After pecking its way outside the tough hide the bird seemed to have become caught and was unable to emerge."

A Spokane man read the item, cut it out of the newspaper and mailed it to John Kendrick Bangs, having read his series of articles on the nature faker published recently in the Spokesman-Review. That Mr. Bangs was intensely interested, and able to go a few better, is evident from the reply received from Mr. Bangs at Ogunquit, Maine, which reads as follows:

"October 4, 1907.—My Dear Mr. Broughton: In the name of Nature Faker's Union No. 6 I salute you, and thank you for the clipping from the Corvallis paper. The incident to which it refers was unusual, but not really extraordinary. Last June my son's little donkey, Marie Corelli, swallowed a pint of bird seed that had carelessly been left on my dining room table, and later on sickened and died. At the autopsy, held two hours later, on cutting him open, 13 canary birds sprang from his interior, five of which are still living, and strange to say, do not sing like ordinary birds, but bray like their foster incubator.

"Nevertheless, I beg to remain, yours faithfully.

John Kendrick Bangs."

A Story For Girls.

This is a story for Corvallis girls. It is not a fairy tale nor a picture drawn from imagination. It is a fact, and for that reason it should be a warning to girls to be on their guard against the soft speeches and sly, double-handed dealings of slick strangers.

There was once a prepossessing looking traveling man who made frequent visits to a certain Willamette valley town, leaving behind him in Portland, a trusting wife and two innocent children. In the valley town, however, the husband and father put aside the memory of the Portland home, passed as a widower and sought the society of unsuspecting young ladies who readily believed his stories and without waiting to learn something of the man, accepted his attentions.

Knowing the fellow to be playing a double game the police and night watch took a hand in the game. Following the traveler and the young lady one night, the men of the law saw the couple make various turns and finally meet and start in an opposite direction from that in which the young lady's is located.

Accosting the couple the officer demanded an explanation of the meeting, asking the traveler: "What would your wife say if she could see this?" The question was enough to settle the matter with the now thoroughly humiliated girl, who accepted the escort of the officer to her home, while the other officer went in the opposite direction with the blustering but crestfallen widower.

It is charitable to draw the curtain. The young woman, who is of excellent character and highly respected, has probably learned a lesson which she will not soon forget. It is probable also, that the aforesaid traveler will put on other and different airs if he ever has the nerve to appear in that Willamette Valley town again. The story is told here by request, in the hope that parents who read it will use every means possible to safe-guard their daughters from the influence of wily strangers or chance acquaintances, and that the girls themselves may be brought to see how silly and how dangerous it is to make appointments with men of whom they know nothing. Good clothes and good looks have little to do with character, and girls should bear in mind the old saw, "all is not gold that glitters."—Corvallis Gazette.
