The Knocker.

You may find him most anywhere, but in our town he is six foot in his stockings when he has any—long and lean and lank. Like a supernannated circus animal he has contracted the habit of sitting down. He sees everything through somber glasses. When the sun shines from a cloudless sky it is just the precursor of a coming storm. We shall never see such high prices for fruit again. The old style of letting the moss grow on the trees suits his taste. Spraying and cultivating are all foolishness. It doesn't pay.

He never contributes a cent for the mental, moral or material advancement of his town except what is wrung out of him by taxation. No trains or mails miss his scrutiny and yet he has little direct interest in either. Hard times comes a knocking at the door and finds a ready response from the knocker for he seems to revel in the thought that everything is going to the bow wows. He is never happy unless he is miserable. He thinks it is a mean trick for the Governor of Oregon to tie up the banks so he can't get his money. And the bankers are all rascally scoundrels for not keeping the depositors money lying up on the shelf till called for.

Josh Billings said the worst thing about a mosquito is that you can't take a gun and shoot it. And the worst thing about a knocker is that you can't shoot him, for its against the law in Oregon. We can only wait in patience till we can dig a hole 3x7 and cover him up out of sight.—Ex.
