Electric Fencing

Although the use of small machines in agriculture is described in the United States and the Argentine, the American farmer who desires to keep a couple of horses and cows in a corral or a barnyard is usually content with the use of a small hand-operated transparent horse-shoeing tool. The idea of using an electric fence to control livestock is now being more and more used by farmers, as the cost of power has come down, and the cost of labor has gone up.

This has probably been due to the fact that electric fencing is very effective and easy to make. The only thing to do is to connect the fence with the power supply and to use a suitable grounding wire. The electric fence will then act as a barrier to livestock, and they will be kept out of the corral or barnyard.
