CHAPTER III. (Concluded.)

their door in the harbor. Their long boat was standing at their door, waiting for the first two of them to come in. And then, when the two were on shore and had given the necessary instructions to the captain of the ship, they would go in to the house and get the last strain of their work out of their way.

"I don't think so," said Peter, "I don't know how it is, but I don't want to go out on the water to-day. I'm going to stay in here and see if I can't learn a little more about the ship."

"You're a good sort, Peter," said the father, laughing. "I'll stay in this house and read a book."

"I'm going to stay in here and read a book," said Peter, "and the best book I know is the one that is written in the language of nature."

"That's a good thought," said the father, "but I don't think you can learn much about the ship by reading a book."

"No, I don't think so," said Peter, "but I think I can learn something about the ship by reading the language of nature."

"That's a good thought," said the father, "but I don't think you can learn much about the ship by reading the language of nature."

"No, I don't think so," said Peter, "but I think I can learn something about the ship by reading the language of nature."

Then Peter went into the room and sat down and read the book. The father went out and took a look at the ship. He saw that it was a fine ship, and he decided that he would go out and see if he could not do something to help Peter.

"I don't think so," said Peter, "I don't want to go out on the water to-day. I'm going to stay in here and learn a little more about the ship."

"You're a good sort, Peter," said the father, laughing. "I'll stay in this house and read a book."

"I'm going to stay in here and read a book," said Peter, "and the best book I know is the one that is written in the language of nature."

"That's a good thought," said the father, "but I don't think you can learn much about the ship by reading a book."

"No, I don't think so," said Peter, "but I think I can learn something about the ship by reading the language of nature."

"That's a good thought," said the father, "but I don't think you can learn much about the ship by reading the language of nature."

"No, I don't think so," said Peter, "but I think I can learn something about the ship by reading the language of nature."

Then Peter went into the room and sat down and read the book. The father went out and took a look at the ship. He saw that it was a fine ship, and he decided that he would go out and see if he could not do something to help Peter.