How We Acquired Alaska.

Have you ever heard how the United States came to purchase Alaska? Let me tell you. It is interesting and I have never seen it narrated in any history. I think it is authentic, for it appeared in one of the Boston weeklies some time after its purchase, but while Secretary Seward was still living to dispute it if untrue.

It seems that during Mr. Buchanan's administration all of the war vessels were somehow gotten into Southern or foreign ports, so that at the breaking out of the Civil War the North had not a single war vessel to protect her coast. Those in foreign ports were recalled, but they were insufficient; something must be done without delay, and there seemed no alternative but to hire; so it came about that Russia sent us a fleet of war vessels. They were to ride off the coast of Maine and hold themselves in readiness to come to our aid whenever we should call for them.

The months and years went by and not once were they called into action; but there they were. It was not their fault that they had not been needed. The war was closed and the fleet went back to Russian waters.

Then came the time when Russia wanted her pay. The fleet was a costly one; the daily drill had been expensive; the cost of feeding so many marines had been enormous—Russia must be paid—but how? The United States treasury was empty. Worse, they had a tremendous war debt. The expenses of the war had been colossal; from beginning to end they had averaged $2,000,000 per day. The national debt rose with frightful rapidity, until in 1865 it had reached $2,800,000,000. State and local war debts swelled it to $4,000,000,000. The position of Mr. Seward, secretary of state, during the war was a trying one; the ordinary income was hardly a drop to a bucket compared with the enormous and constantly increasing expenses—but Russia wanted her money—$7,000,000. Secretary Seward and his colleagues were at their wits' end. Seven million dollars and no services rendered! What would the people say?

A bright idea originated in someone's head. Russia owned Alaska, then called Russian America. It was remote and of little value to her. Why could we not buy it from her? Russia, for the sake of getting the seven million dollars she claimed, might be induced to sell Alaska for a sum sufficiently in excess of the amount demanded for the fleet.

The plan worked. In 1867 Russian America became ours for the sum of $7,200,000, and nothing was ever again said about our indebtedness for the fleet.

The news of the purchase was received with great consternation. Had our officials at Washington gone mad? With our tremendous war debt, why had they just at this time increased it to purchase a cold desolate tract for which we had no use? Secretary Seward had not the face to explain matters; but Alaska was ours, the debt to Russia was off our hands, and that was enough.

A few years later gold was discovered there; also coal, and beautiful white marble. These rich mines, together with its wealth in furs, have proved to us that we purchased wiser than we knew.

Today it is only a matter of tradition how Alaska became ours.—By B. F. S. in Home Friend.
