Deepening the Rivers.

The Daily Oregonian of Wednesday, editorially, says:

"Every inlet from the sea that can be made navigable at a cost not disproportionate to the advantages which will result should be improved. The Government has in the past wasted so much money on unworthy waterway improvement projects that it is steadily becoming more difficult to secure Federal aid, and communities and districts are thus thrown more on their own immediate resources. Portland has spent millions in building a channel from this city to the sea, and the result of that expenditure is felt beneficially by every producer of freight in the entire Columbia basin, although no assistance has been given Portland by other communities which share in the profits of the improvement. The example set by Portland in performing a task in which the expense should have been shared by the people of the entire Columbia basin has not been without value, however, for a number of other ports have since begun working out improvement projects planned on similar lines.

"The latest to announce a channel improvement to the sea is the port of Toledo, a thriving little city on the Yaquina river, at present inaccessible for any but very small seagoing vessels. Toledo is located on the Corvallis & Eastern Railroad and is in the heart of a very fine timber region. The California market always supplies a heavy demand for cheaper grades of lumber than can be shipped to advantage by rail, and it is proposed to improve the Yaquina river from Toledo to the sea in such manner that vessels of 16-foot draft can load at the Yaquina mills. Lumber-carriers of this type can handle freight at a profit where smaller vessels would be impracticable. If the Port of Toledo is successful in its efforts, a large area of territory in Lincoln county will feel a direct benefit. There is at the present time and will continue to be, considerable north-bound business between California and the lumber ports of Oregon and Washington.

"Lumber vessels bound up the coast for cargo will usually carry cargo on the north-bound trip at a very low rate of freight, which of course is advantageous to consumers in the favored locality. A 16-foot channel in the Yaquina river up to Toledo would do something more than increase substantially the value of every foot of timber in that portion of the big county. It would increase development of the timber industry and give employment to more men. These in turn would have to become consumers of fruit, vegetables, dairy products and other Lincoln county staples, and other industries would accordingly improve in keeping with what for awhile would be the premier industry of the county. The port of Toledo, like the port of Tillamook or the port of Portland, can, if supported as it should be, prove a pre-eminent factor in development of the region it will serve."
