A practice game of baseball was played Sunday afternoon. The game was called rather late but the full nine innings was played. Chas. Murphy pitched for one team while the other side used Chapin and Darnell. The result was a tie game.

A few months ago an item appeared in this column regarding the dangerous practice of "swell riding" at the mouth of Alsea bay, but such things go heedless and nothing short of a "uners" will empathize the fact sufficiently to have any effect. Sunday morning about eleven o'clock five young men of Waldport went out to the bar buoy in a small launch. The sea was rather calm but the usual northwest wind was gathering and by the time the launch was headed for the bay the bar was rather choppy.

A large amount of water was shipped and the engine was put out of commission. An anchor was immediately dropped but failed to hold against the strong wind and the heavy current at the mouth of the bay. The launch drifted south and the anchor finally held the launch in the trough of the sea just inside the outer line of breakers. In this perilous position the launch remained several hours, the boys using their hats to bail out the water. Shortly after two o'clock the Anvil passed and stopped a short distance above the bar long enough to ascertain that they could not safely send a boat into the breakers, and then went on. Just after this the cannery boat, in charge of C. R. Dobbins, crossed out over the bar but found it impossible to reach the boys. At three o'clock those on shore were much relieved to see that the engine on the little launch was again running and by following the line of breakers to the bar the launch came in safely. Their rescue was accomplished only by luck and as it was five mothers spent hours of agony and brothers and sisters wept at what was thought by the watchers to be a certain fate for none of the boys are good swimmers. And some of these boys who went to the buoy just for fun succeeded in convincing their mothers that they were at Yaquina John Point when their engine broke and that they drifted out to sea against a strong flood tide.
