and waited for daylight. More searchers arrived and the party numbered 30 by seven in the morning.

At nine they found her in an old cabin where she had taken refuge. The night was cold and she was thinly clad, without hat or coat, and must have suffered severely.

She told her story of hearing a bell and going over a hill and across a canyon, only to find the cows were not there. The place was strange to her and she struck off in what she thought the direction of home. She wandered about till it grew so dark she could no longer go and then lay down under a tree and waited for daylight.

It is a rough and hilly country and very difficult to travel, even by daylight. It was a thankful party that gathered when the missing girl reached home and the news of finding her spread.
