"I suppose so." "Well, Mr. Pinchpenny, I must be going. What is your place worth?" Caleb eyed his visitor sharply. "10,000 dollars," he said craftily. "Thank you," said the stranger. "I am the new tax assessor. Good day." Caleb watched him disappear and then stamped around to the back door in high dudgeon, where his wife was washing. A tub of hot water was standing on the floor. Just as Caleb came opposite to the tub the cat ran in front of him. He swung around with his back to the tub and kicked viciously at the cat. In some unaccountable manner he slipped and forcibly sat down in the tub of water. Well! Moral: Don't be a moss-back like Caleb. Help yourself in your farming operations by helping to install a county agent. He'll help you.

CALEB'S MISTAKE (By Will Ellsworth)

Caleb Pinchpenny sat on his porch, looking over his farm. He was offering it for sale. He had farmed many years and had seen his county slowly losing ground while the neighboring counties forged ahead. He had fought high taxes, had beaten his progressive neighbors in their fight for roads, bridges, co-operative creameries etc.; refused to allow a cheese factory to be erected on his land and had fought the installation of a county agent bitterly. His crops grew more sparse every year, his land growing poorer under mismanagement. Land values decreased and taxes were higher in a direct ratio. So he had posted a "For Sale" notice on his front gate in disgust. If things went wrong it wasn't his fault. And these fellows all wanted county agents, roads, etc., just to raise taxes. He wouldn't stand for it. Let them go ahead if they wanted to. Put silos up and kill his cows on sour corn? He should say not! These new-fangled book-farmers made regular fools of themselves! Even if their cream-checks were fatter than his, it was just pure luck. So he watched a stranger come up the walk with interest. The man asked whether he was the proprietor of the farm, and what his price was, as he had noticed the sign. Caleb thought he looked easy, so he said: "I ain't sure I want to sell." "Looks as though this was a good dairy country. Lots of silos and cows and feed right in the next county," said the stranger, seating himself. "It's just as good as any," said Caleb. "My farm's worth lots of money." "No doubt," returned the stranger, "but wouldn't it be worth more if you had silos and roads and things like that?" "Silos cost money and roads make taxes high," said Caleb. "But wouldn't you make more money? Couldn't you pay taxes easier? If you are making $1000 now in a year and would make $2000 next year, couldn't you pay $10 more taxes and not feel it?"
