PETCOCK ON MANIFOLD FOR FEEDING AIR

"There was one device I placed on my motor that served several purposes, but was extremely simple," says W. Penn Lukens in the November issue of MoTOR. "It was a regular one-quarter-inch drip cock, screwed into the intake manifold just where it branched to go to the different cylinders. To the handle of the drip cock was riveted an iron rod that came through the dash and terminated in a handle. Then when the motor was warmed up, and I had a nice run ahead, I could keep my seat, open the cock in the manifold and admit excess air above the carburetor, giving me an average of ten to fifteen per cent, less gas consumption, besides reducing carbon formation."

"Once in a while I fed water or kerosene into the cylinders by means of this device, and found it useful in keeping down carbon in this way as well. When cold weather came I found I did not need excess air and did need a primer, so I retained the device with the modification that I soldered into the air opening a small brass tube that dipped into the float chamber of the carburetor. Of course, I was careful to see that it did not interfere with the float action. Then by keeping the throttle closed, opening the petcock and turning over the motor, the suction in the manifold drew the gasoline directly from the float chamber and sprayed it directly into the manifold near the cylinders, constituting a very effective priming device."
