SEED IS TAKEN FROM CRAW OF WILD DUCK
Plants Grown Near Marshfield Prove To Be Buckwheat—Seed May Have Come from Atlantic Coast.
Seed taken from the craw of a wild duck several years ago was planted on a hill land in the vicinity of Marshfield. The resulting plants grew luxuriantly. A sample of the seed has been received at the Oregon Agricultural College and a request made by the owner of the plants who failed to sign his name, that it be examined and identified.
The plant is a species of buckwheat, but is not the kind commonly known commercially, according to Miss Helen M. Gilkey, assistant professor of botany. Tartarian buckwheat, India wheat and duckwheat, it is variously called, and is distinguished from the common species in having rough grains small inconspicuous flowers, and decidedly arrow shaped leaves. The only places in the United States in which it is known to have been grown extensively are two states of the Atlantic coast, vvtuuutiuvt.kitun tivluidd-tstns
