 Chas. Tillotson has moved his logging camp from Pool's slough having taken all the available marketable logs from the land on which his camp was located. The Toledo mill will have to get its supply of logs from the timber on the Depot slough hereafter. There is a large body of good timber on the head of Depot, but it will take some little expense to get at it. A road will have to be made to the timber, and a couple of dams will have to be put in on the head of Depot slough.

INOCULATE IF SEPTICEMIA APPEARS
 (By the County Agent)
 Easier to Prevent than Cure. Similar to Blackleg.....

Careful diagnosis of the cause of the recent death of two cows on the farm of G. S. Hackett develops the fact that this much dreaded disease septicemia is appearing in Lincoln County this year. A recent letter from A. Martinson of Tidewater tells of another outbreak of disease among his young stock, the symptoms of which lead the County Agent to believe it is without doubt septicemia.
 State Veterinarian Lyle visited Toledo Friday and vaccinated Mr. Hackett's herd. County Agent Cooter secured a supply of the vaccine and left Saturday for Tidewater to treat the Martinson herd and any other stock likely to be affected in that neighborhood.
 Treatment after the animal has taken sick is absolutely useless, as far as we know at present, so a preventative vaccine for well animals is the only remedy to be relied upon. County Agent Cooter particularly urges every farmer to familiarize himself with the symptoms of the disease and report the first suspicious case at once to State Veterinarian Lyle, a local veterinarian or to the County Agent's office.
 Mr. Martinson reports his calves as going off feed, bleeding from ears, nose and eyes, the calves dying at intervals of 2 to 5 days from the time of first symptoms. He also reports that one of his neighbors lost all of his calves from the disease last year.

Following is given a description of the disease as given by the Veterinary division of the United States Department of Agriculture. "Three forms of the disease are recognized, based upon the distribution of the lesions—the superficial, or cutaneous, the pectoral, or thoracic, and the intestinal form. The latter is a unusual accompaniment of the other two and may be mild or severe. Naturally the symptoms vary according to the violence of the attack and to the particular form of disease with which the animal is affected. In the superficial or cutaneous form, the presence of a swollen tongue, throat, and dewlap, or even of the lower portion of the legs, gives us a clew to the trouble. An entire loss of appetite occurs, and in milk cows there is a diminution of the milk secretion. The temperature may be only slightly elevated, but it is usually very high. Salivation is set up by the inflammation of the mouth and pharynx. Unsuccessful efforts at eating and swallowing are made. There may be difficulty in breathing, depending on the amount of involvement of the larynx, trachea, bronchi, or lungs. There may be blood stained discharges from the nostrils, and the mucous membrane thereof will often show punctiform hemorrhages. The pulmonary form shows the same symptoms as croupous pneumonia, with a frequent suffocative cough and oppressed breathing, or dyspnea. When the intestines are involved the patient strains to defecate, and passes shreds of intestinal mucous along with blood-stained feces. The urine may also be tinged with blood. Finally severe diarrhoea takes place the animal becomes correspondingly weak, and death occurs in 24 to 36 hours. Cases may die in as short a period as six to eight hours, while in the pectoral form of the disease the animal may linger six to eight days. Cases have been reported which became chronic and in which death did not take place for a month or more. In some of the cases running an acute course, symptoms of toxemia are present; there is a lack of sensation of the skin, staggering gait, trembling, eyes fixed, neck at times bent to one side, and the eyes showing a wild expression. At times the animals appear as if in pain and look around at the flanks. In the pectoral form they may stand with the forelegs wide apart in evident effort to breath more freely. Sometimes there is a champing of the jaws and a very free flow of glairy saliva dropping from the mouth.
 The prognosis is decidedly unfavorable and 80 to 90 per cent of the cases result fatally.
 Treatment—Treatment after the animal has taken sick is absolutely useless as far as we know at the present time, so a preventative vaccine for the well animals is the only method to be relied upon."
 The State Veterinarian, Dr. W. H. Lyle, has been trying to keep this disease in check and has vaccinated several herds. Where cases appear it is best to notify the State Veterinarian and if he cannot give it his immediate attention call a local veterinarian.
