

Yesterday morning a careless man on South Hill threw a mug of hot shaving water out of a second-story window. Instantly the pale air was streaked with shrieks, and, looking out he saw that he had emptied the treacherous element on the head of his wife, who was digging in the geranium bed with a pine stick. He leaned out of the window to laugh in hollow accents, when the rash fell with frightful velocity, shutting off his wind. His wife, dismayed at her unexpected shower bath, and appalled at her husband's situation, turned to run into the house and release him, and in her haste ran against the baby's cot, upsetting it and hurling the baby upon a cactus plant. The domestic up-stairs, hearing the shrieks in the front yard, and doubting that the baby had been devoured by a tramp, sprang down stairs to the rescue with such alacrity that she only touched two steps, the first and the last one—touching the first one with her feet and the last one with her head. A neighbor, running to the general rescue, stepped on a broken plank in the sidewalk and fell the distance of a hundred and one feet, spraining his ankle so badly that he won't walk for three weeks. By this time the man, with a violent effort, which scalped the entire back portion of his head, got out of the window, having previously dropped his razor, which fell on the edge of a flower pot and nicked itself worse than a coach horse, and comparative order was soon restored. But the man says he will never again tempt the anger of the immortal gods by shaving himself.

A little boy, whose sprained wrist had been relieved by bathing in whisky, surprised his mother by asking "if papa had a sprained throat."

The young man who boasted he could marry any girl he pleased found that he couldn't please any.

The latest thing out is usually a young man with a latch key.
