

was represented as being a good mountaineer and Indian fighter, was secured. The party set out in good spirits, and in full faith that the trip could be made to Shasta, (Yreka) in ten days, as represented by their guide. From Fort Orford, they proceeded down the coast as far as the mouth of Rogue River, a distance of 30 miles, finding Indians numerous, and of a very tawdry disposition. It was a part of their plan to follow up the north side of Rogue River, if practicable. They traveled within a few miles of the river, over a very rough country, to a point now known as the Big Bend, their general course so far, being about northeast. They had then been out some ten days, their provisions well nigh exhausted, with very little prospect of soon reaching their destination. At this stage of affairs one-half the men seeing little prospect of success, determined to return to camp. The remainder, ten in number, being more resolute, resolved to push forward, and if possible, reach the mines. The names of those who decided to brave the perils of a savage and hostile people, and almost at the mercy of chance for food, plunged again in the illimitable forest, were W. G. T. Vault, of Oregon; Cyrus Hedden, of New Jersey; Gilbert Benish and Cornelius Doherty, of Texas; Thomas Devenport, of Massachusetts; Jeremiah Ryan, of Maryland; John P. Pepper and Patrick Murphy, of New York; John Holland, of New Hampshire and L. L. Williams, of Michigan. From the Big Bend, the party proceeded two days travel up the river, when they fell upon a plain Indian trail leading from the river into the mountains, in nearly a due north course. Their guide who had already expressed his belief that they were fast approaching the settlements near Winchester, on the Umpqua river, now assured them that this trail led from Rogue river to Fort Umpqua, an old Hudson Bay Post, thirty miles below Winchester near a place now known as Elkton. He further assured them that, by following this trail, they would reach the Post in one or two days. They, therefore, abandoned their southern trip and set out for that point. They were now on very short rations, depending almost entirely on game for subsistence.

After traveling for three days, over a very rough mountainous country, they came upon a stream thirty or forty yards wide, since known to be the South Fork of the Coquille. Here they found plenty of Indian sign. Following down this stream some twenty miles, they found an occasional Indian ranch the occupants fleeing on their approach. Believing this to be Coos River, they again set out north, guided by only a pocket compass, for the Umpqua river, being assured by their guide that it could not possibly be far distant. Following this course, they struck what is now known to be Middle Fork of the Coquille, where they again found much Indian sign. Traveling down this stream to near the junction of the Middle and North Forks, they again struck off in a north direction, and soon found themselves on the North Fork. They followed up this stream some 500 yards, endeavoring to find a crossing. This stream was nearly thirty yards wide and quite deep, and exhibited signs of some eighteen inches tide water. At this point, Mr. Williams succeeded in killing a pheasant, and Mr. Doherty a gray squirrel. Here Mr. Ryan declared his inability to go farther, and their guide, Mr. T. Vault, laid down, and told the men that if they proceeded farther, they must leave him. This was in the forenoon of Sept. 13th. While deliberating on what course to pursue, two canoe loads of Indians were observed ascending the stream. After a hasty consultation, it was decided to hail the Indians and enter into negotiations for food and a passage down the river, their guide expressing a belief that they could reach civilization by no other means. They succeeded after a time in getting a talk with the Indians, and found that they were willing either to take the party down the river, or sell them a canoe. A difference of opinion now arose among the men. Some were in favor of buying a canoe, others of hiring the Indians to take them to the mouth of the river in their canoes, and from there, to make their way to Port Orford, along the beach. The latter course was decided on and the services of the Indians with two canoes were obtained by giving them all their blankets. They experienced much relief by their new mode of traveling.

There's a difference in time, you know, between this country and Europe, said a gentleman on the wharf to a newly-arrived Irishman. "For instance, your friends at Cork are in bed and asleep by this time, while we are enjoying ourselves in the early evening." "That's always the way," exclaimed Pat. "Ireland never got justice yet."
