Emperor and Boy.

One of the commissioners from Brazil to the Philadelphia exposition, told fifteen minutes we saw two persons a pleasant story of the emporor. A lad cheat successfully. We heard four a pleasant story of the emporor. A lad of good family, in Rio Janeiro, found himself left, by the death of his father, friendless and penniless. One day he saw a middle-aged gentleman plainly | mallet against the fence so hard that it dressed, and with a singularly candid, kind countenance, walking aong in the to be unnoticed, to go up and down as two young men looked sheepish and the father of his people."

"It he is the father of his people," said the boy, "he will take some interest in me;" and approaching the emperor, though trembling with fright, be told his story in a few direct words. Dom Pedro listened attentively. .. What is it that you want, my boy?" "An education, your majesty. If I had that I could be of some use to my-design you?" "That of a civil engineer, sir." "Come to me at noon to morrow." The emperor inquired concerning the lad, and then took upon himself the whole expense of his support and education, sending him to this country to receive the latter. The fact which gives more significence to the story is that the emperor is comparatively a poor man, his income being much less than that of many wealthy Brazilian gentlemen. Even the education of this one boy involved a certain amount of self-sacrifice on his part. Dom Pedro cares nothing for luxury, pomp, or even the honors of the world; his whole aim is the elevation and improvement of his subjects. For this purpose he has visited almost every civilized country, carrying home the best in theory and practice, to experiment in Brazil. He was accustomed on his tour of investigation at the exposition, to go about incognito, in shabby coat and trousers, to the great disappointment of the crowd. They did not recognize the fact that no in signia of royalty could add dignity to such real majesty of character.
