appliances, made thousands of journeys through the air, and recorded with more or less accuracy their experiences and circumstances. A few have sacrificed their lives in these voyages of discovery, and to them also the world owes its tribute.

For the object is well worth all the effort and genius which have been devoted to it. Aerialnavigators would create a new world, as truly as steam navigation on land and sea have created a new world within the last century. If the air can be traversed at all with certainty and safety, much higher rates of speed are to be expected than have been attained on land or water, though perhaps not with bulky or heavy loads. For the movement of passengers with the greatest possible comfort and enjoyment, and for the swift transportation of letters and packages of small size, the air path will be preferable to any other. The oceans and lakes will cease to divide nations, even as little as they do now, for with ordinary fortune a voyage across the Atlantic might be made in two days as easily as it is now in six, and probably with far less people to health and

The Inter-State Commerce Law,

The fate of the air voyager, Professor Hogan, says the New York Tribune, is not to be classed with that of the senseless person who jamped into eternity from a lofty bridge, or the other senseless person who rode through the Niagara whirlpool in a barrel. Aerial navigation has been the dream of the thoughtful for half a century. For great progress already attained the world owes much to those who have tested hundreds of appliances, made thousands of journeys through the air, and recorded with more or less accuracy their experiences.
