The men employed in the iron mills ofAbram S. Hewitt have struck upon a point remote from wages but involving limitation upon his control of his own business. During the depression following the crash of 1873, Mr. Hewitt following the crasmon is more in wages $200,000 per year more than the income of his business. Other iron men closed their mills, turned their labor into the street and waited for good times on the profit they had made. Mr. Hevitt kept his mill open rather than discharge his laborers to starve. His men are now gratefully requiting his humanity by tying up his business.
