American ladies. He used to mention with pride that one woman in New York city had bought $55,000 worth of gowns of him. Perhaps she was a dressmaker and in the trade herself. Queen Victoria was the only woman of note in Europe who never had a gown from him. And yet with all the fuss and feathers, the buckram, haircloth. and crinoline, the pinching in and whale-boning of the modern woman's dress, the opinion that the dress of the Turkish patronage of Marie Antoinette, went to pieces, like other existing things; and Elise Bonaparte was turned adrift with no friend in France except her sullen brother. To the credit of the latter, he clung to his sister, and presently took advantage of her presence to get another leave of absence, "in order to conduct her home." But he did not do so until his cause in the war-office had, on the 30th of August, been decided in his favor. He was exonerated, restored to rank, promoted to a captaincy, and to crown all the new commission was dated back to the preceding February.

This was a great victory for the man of destiny. He was Captain Bonaparte. Taking Elise by the hand, he sped away to Lyons and Valence-where he paused to be seen in his new regimentals-and then to Marseilles and Corsica. His return brought together at Ajaccio all the members of the family of Bonaparte. He left behind in Paris the Countess Josephine de Beauharnais, aged twenty-nine. And yon-der at Vienna, in her Hapsburg cradle, nine months old, lies the girl-babe Maria Louise. These two shall have relations with history in the next two decades! As for King Louis, he goes down the steeps, with ever-accelerated pace, from the Temple prison to the guillotine.

France had now become an ocean of molten brass, seething, bubbling, breaking along the billows into flames of lurid light. The Revolution was coming to its crisis. Hunger and despair in the hearts of men had done their perfect work. War was on with Prussia and Austria and England. The emigrant nobility across the borders was in league with the enemies of the French nation. That nation had sprung up, an infuriated tigress, and woe be henceforth to traitors! There was intrigue between the dying court and the Emigres beyond the Rhine. It was now or never. The Terror came on; chateaus were flaming; the streets were slippery with red; the axe went always up and down in the Place de la Revolution; the day of death and extermination was at

This condition of affairs in the extinct kingdom of the Bourbons brought the revolutionists of France and those of Corsica into closest sympathy; for Jacobinism is universal. It is simply humanity in insurrection. Whether it be in France, in Germany, in Italy, in the Mediterranean islands, in England, or the party-cursed cities of the United States, it is all the same. The only question with Bonaparte now was whether his destiny might be better attained by the leadership of the Corsican revolutionists or by allying himself with the Jacobins of Paris.

With skillful duplicity he did both. Corsica, on his return, was in a ferment. The popular party was at one with the French democrats. The National Convention passed a decree that the exiled Corsican patriots might return. Paoli went home by way of Paris, where he was recognized as a hero and made lieutenantgeneral and military governor of his native island. France was divided into departments, and Corsica was declared to be one of these.

Meanwhile, the world was turned upside down. The Convention had taken the autumnal equinox of 1792 as the date of a new era for mankind. It was an epoch of universal abolition. The marvelous thing was that while the old expired under the stroke of the destroyer's wand, the new did not spring up in its place. The King was brought to trial and death beautiful, comfortable and appropriate The French prohibition against American cattle does not include meats already dressed or canned. It is a question whether it is not a far more merciful and healthful way to slaughter the cattle on this side and ship the beef in refrigerators. France's embargo on live cattle will necessarily decide the question in favor of dressed beef. There will be opportunity for the growth of an immense trade in refrigerator meats for export to France. If cattle breeders are wise and shrewd, they will establish great slaughtering plants and get as much out of their dressed meats as they did before from live cattle. Besides that, they will be making employment for hundreds of men out of work. with the disease of patriotism. The colonel of the Fourth Regiment was an old royalist who had gladly cut off the Jacobin Bonaparte from his command. It was useless for the latter to return to Valence, hoping to be reinstated at such a court. He therefore made all speed for Paris, where he would have a hearing before the minister of war.

By the summer of 1792 the roaring winds of revolution were shaking not only the pinnacles, but the very foundations, of French civilization. The old order was already in ruins. Paris was in an uproar. The King and court had been obliged in the preceding autumn to leave Versailles and come, in the most remarkable procession of history, to Paris. The starving populace had gone out to the royal palace, invaded it, hooted around it, drawn forth the King and Queen and their ill fated scion, and had hurried them off into the city, dancing about them en route and shouting in wild jocularity that now they had the baker and the bakeress and the baker's little boy! All this wreck of royalty and nobility heaped itself up in the Tuileries, out of which the ancient monarchy of the Bourbons looked with wan face at the weltering world. The National Convention went on and on, demolishing and reforming, destroying and remorselessly casting out the old institutions of France, and in lieu thereof making a new Constitution out of philosophy and

It was to this Paris that Napoleon came, with a billet of dismissal and a petition for reinstatement. One war minis ter after another, to the number of six, had now filled the important office before which Bonaparte stood a petitioner for rehearing. The new minister was a Nationalist and favorably disposed towards the Corsican adventurer; for the latter came with a haggard revolutionary face and long hair hanging to his shoulders. There was delay in the office; and Bonaparte, with his former schoolfellow and future secretary, Bourrienne, was well nigh starving in the streets.

The proud daughter of Theresa went swiftly after her lord.

Moderate patriots throughout France and the world were alarmed and angered. Washington would follow Liberty no further. Paoli, establishing himself at Corte, stood for moderation. He was too old and conservative to be rebaptized in the muddy waters of Jacobinism. But Captain Bonaparte at Ajaccio was not of such mind and kind. He found himself at this juncture on two military steeds, both going in the same direction, but at different rates of speed. He had never resigned his commission as colonel in the Corsican Nation al Guards; but he now held a commission as captain in the French army, and was receiving pay from the national treasury. His captaincy and his colonelcy did not consist. He temporized and intrigued with the revolutionists during the winter of 1792-93; had an interview with Paoli at Corte: departed without satisfaction: broke with the governor, who ceased to be a hero in his eyes; made a conspiracy to invade Sardinia; tried to obtain an independent command; fell under condemnation of the Paolists, and in June of 1793, was obliged to leave Corsica with all the family of Bonaparte.

Napoleon arrived at Nice on the 13th of June, and there rejoined his company. The Fourth Regiment, to which he belonged, had been transferred to the extreme southeast, as a protection against the menaces of the world along that threatened coast. The whole valley of the Rhone was aflame with the Revolution. Horror on horror had been heaped throughout France. In Paris the royal family had been done to death; but on the frontier the French republican armies of Custine and Kellerman the one at Frankfort and the other at Valmy, after brave battles, had been pressed back from the border. Only that of Dumouriez had triumphed over the Austrians, on the bloody field of Jemmapes, establishing a line of defenses as far as Liege in Belgium and the river Scheldt. Meanwhile, after the execution of the King, the allied powers of Europe pledged themselves to exterminate the new French Republic-Terror and all-from the face of the earth. It was a thing easily promised, but difficult to accomplish! The duke of Brunswick, notwithstanding his famous proclamation against the French and the liberties of mankind, found it so to his sorrow. England having joined the coalition against the enraged Republic, the latter virtually declared war against the world! Into the midst of all this confusion, uproar and insurrection of an infuriated people against kingdoms and principalities, the hair-line of the solitary Corsican captain's life was now drawn-a black mark almost undiscoverable among the sketches and etchings which history was cutting for the future civilization of Europe.

Napoleon became a French Republican soldier. He was a soldier of fortune in a sense more profound than that phrase had ever before conveyed. It must be confessed that the hardships and merciless conditions through which he had passed, bearing with relentless pressure on his tremendous mind-inflamed as it was with unquenchable ambitions-are better calculated to excite the compassion and sympathy of after times to kindle against him that anger and censoriousness which a merely logical consideration of his shortcomings, failures and unprincipled schemes would suggest. The judgment is mitigated in contemplating such a character emerging from obscurity, under the play of complex forces, into the foreground of light and action.

The regiment of Captain Bonaparte constituted a part of the Army of the South, under command of General Carteaux.
