John Chevers in 1914

In 1899, Mrs. John Chevers presented to the public school a handsome trophy and a sum of money to be awarded annually to the pupil who should most fully represent the spirit of the high churchman. The trophy was to be a gold medal, and the student who should win it would be awarded $100. The trophy was a gift of Mrs. John Chevers, who had been a member of the high church movement in England for many years.

The trophy was awarded to a student who had shown the most outstanding achievement in scholarship and character. The student who won the trophy was chosen by the faculty of the high school, and the trophy was presented in a ceremony in the school auditorium. The ceremony was attended by a large number of people, including the mayor of the city and the president of the school board.

The “Tichborne Dole,” a Quint English Charity

The Tichborne Dole was a charity established in England in the early 19th century to help the poor and the elderly. The charity was named after the Tichborne family, who were the patrons of the charity. The Tichborne family had been prominent in English society for many years, and they had established the charity to help the less fortunate members of society.

The charity was run by a committee of trustees, who were responsible for managing the funds and distributing them to the poor and the elderly. The charity was funded by the Tichborne family, and it was supported by the government and by voluntary contributions from the public.

The charity provided a range of services to those in need, including food, clothing, and medical care. The charity also provided financial support to those who were unable to work due to illness or old age.

The charity was a model of compassionate care, and it was a source of hope and support for many people in need. The charity was widely respected, and it was held in high esteem by the English people.

The charity was run efficiently and effectively, and it was a source of inspiration for many other charities in England and around the world. The charity was a reminder of the importance of compassion and care for the less fortunate members of society.

The “Tichborne Dole” was a quintessential English charity, and it was a symbol of the best of English society. The charity was a testament to the enduring values of compassion and care, and it continues to inspire people around the world today.
