His principal object in coming to Oregon was to urge the States senator. He did not know anything about Lane, he said, but wanted him elected because he was a democrat. He referred to the claim that there would be a panic if the democrats were elected, but thought people should risk something for their country. His plea along the entire line was for the election of the democratic candidates and for the democratic policies.

Almost if not quite as much a center of attraction was Governor West of Oregon, who came to Ashland to meet Governor Marshall and escort him across the state. He was heartily greeted by his many friends and admirers here and gracefully intro-
