Joe Knowles, the Artist-Nature Man

Joe Knowles, the artist-nature man who has been for thirty days contesting with Dame Nature in the Siskiyou wilds, arrived in Grants Pass Saturday afternoon and was given a hearty welcome back to civilization.

His nature suit consisted of the skins of the two deer which he had obtained while in the woods, one deer, the one killed by the cougar, the other the one Mr. Knowles caught in the snare. One skin was wrapped about his body and the other was hung from the shoulder. He also wore deerskin moccasins upon his feet. Moving pictures were again made of Mr. Knowles and the crowd during the demonstration upon Sixth street.

The nature man looks little the worse for his thirty days in the woods. He has lost some of the surplus flesh which he carried when he went into the mountains, weighing now 181½ pounds, as against 202 when he commenced the stunt. His skin is tanned a deep copper color, and his uncombed hair and grizzled six-weeks beard gave him an unkempt appearance that was general in the days before men had made acquaintance with the tonsorial art. He looked the real idea of the primitive human.

The bathtub and the barber shop were the first civilizing influences that Joe wanted to see after the acclaim of his reception was over. He wanted his Boston clothes and a new pair of shoes. The pavement felt strange beneath his soles and the noises of traffic were strange sounds in ears used to the twitter of the sparrow or the chirp of the chipmunk.

There are none who have been in touch with the movements of Knowles during the period of his nature experiment but are satisfied that he has made good, that there has been neither fraud nor deception in his work. Both Professor Waterman of the California State University and Professor Edwards of the Los Angeles schools are satisfied that he has made good and made good honestly.

The one big piece of work that has been accomplished by Knowles during his month in the woods has been the painting of a marvelous nature picture. This is upon a slab of white fir bark, and all the pigments are from the things provided by nature. The painting is of a moonlight scene in the forest, and the colors are of mosses, dead woods and leaves and other waste matter of nature, ground upon a stone and mixed with balsam from the fir. It is a real work of art, and upon it Knowles put much of his time for the past three weeks. Knowles is proud of this picture, as well he may be. He is not proud of the fact that he snared an innocent deer. This was a matter of necessity, and no more life was taken by him than was absolutely needed to give him food and covering for his body. When he had assured himself that he had accomplished this much, he then took up the picture.

Knowles brings back from the wilds the surplus from his larder. The deer flesh and fish he dried, and could have lived for a couple of weeks longer upon this surplus had it been necessary. He proved his ability to get his living from the Siskiyou wilds without the aid of arms or implements. Aside from the suffering caused by the poisoning of his feet during the first few days, Knowles did not mind the hardships of his test. The nights he found colder than the nights in the Maine woods, and the native timber a little more difficult with which to start a fire by primitive methods. For this reason he started but two fires during the time of his experiment, depending upon keeping the coals banked and alive. Speaking of his fire-making, Knowles said:

"I had a hard time getting fire as there is no wood up here without a grain. I tried more than twenty times, and it was more an accident than anything else that I got fire the first night. I have found now a punk of dry aspen, the same thing I used to work in the moon on my picture, which carries a spark better than anything else. I have only built a fire twice. When I wanted to go from my camp to another place to spend a night I carried a spark smothered in punk."

When Knowles arrived in the camp of his associates last Wednesday the first thing he wanted was tea. Then of the camp larder he selected corned beef and biscuits.

"The main thing I have had to eat lately," he said, "is venison and prickly gooseberries and squawberries, tons of them. Then I had a few partridges and squirrels, half ripe blackberries, green fern roots and unripe hazelnuts." And this menu, while not at all times the most appetizing without salt or seasoning, maintained strength, and Knowles comes back full of physical strength and vigor.

FASHION HINT

By JUDIC CHOLLET

Girls will like this pretty, graceful wrap both for evening and afternoon use, and it is fashionable for both purposes.

The neck finish makes an especially youthful feature.

In the illustration shrimp pink charmeuse satin is lined with white.

Since the cape requires only two short darts for its fitting, it is the simplest possible garment to make.

Girls who are planning wardrobes for return to college and school will be especially interested in these practical features.

For the medium size the long cape will require five and one-half yards of
