Mayor Johnson In Rat Business

Mayor Johnson addressed the council Tuesday evening on the rodental question of rats. He said the rat business was entirely too thriving. He didn't believe rats and jewelry went well together. Also, while he liked children, he did not want his diamond shop to become a nursery, with himself as the head manager of the concern. He had finally become, after closely examining the many poorly cured scalps, and written about fifty five-cent orders on the recorder, not so solicitous in exterminating the threatening bubonic epidemic. Consequently he asked that the recorder be authorized to pay all bounties, and the request was granted. Now the recorder has to establish a scalp-burying ground in the back yard, and dole out five-cent pieces to eagerly waiting kiddies.

Farmers Must Use Care in Slaughter

J. D. Mickle, the dairy and food commissioner, writes that all farmers selling meat in the city must comply with the law in regard to handling and slaughtering. This means that they must provide a suitable slaughter house, situated on a well-drained place. The floor must be water tight and the walls sealed with scantling board up to a height of eight feet. It must have a cooling room which is absolutely flyproof. It has been thought that many of the farmers have been slaughtering meat contrary to these conditions. Mr. Mickle's letter was read before the city council Tuesday evening. This requirement is not hard on meat sellers, as several of these can band together and build a small slaughter house suitable for the purpose.
