SOLDIER'S LETTER

The army still had many soldiers stationed at various places along the road. At every place where we had a chance to stop and talk with any of the fellows, the only topic of general interest was the date of our return to the U. S. A. I can assure you that it looked good to see so much army, and U. S. Army at that. I was so sick of Navy blue that I wanted to stay a week at every place I saw a bunch of khaki congregated. The nearer we got to Verdun the more numerous the evidences of American occupation became. One of the soldiers I was with called our attention to what appeared to be a frame building away over on the countryside. "It was a Red Cross building, hospital, you know," he said, "and it was just finished when a shell came thru the roof and simply lifted the whole thing up. It was just a chance shot, and could have fallen any place else, but it happened to pick that one particular spot."

We got into Verdun sometime about noon and asked some soldiers where we could get something to eat. They invited us to go over to the engineers' camp. "There were half a dozen sailors out here a short time ago, and stayed a week with us," one of them said. I should like to have done the same, for while I'm not keen on soldiering, I can have a better time with the army than with any other crowd I know of.

Nevertheless, inasmuch as four of the fellows wanted to go into the city at once (for the station lies outside the walls) we all stayed together, and got a good meal at the Y. M. C. A. It was quite a good "Y" and I was more favorably impressed with the organization there than I had been at any time before in France. There was a curious exhilaration in being in Verdun. The in no wise so badly destroyed as Rheims it was more redolent of war. It was still under military law and it is only a short time ago that it was returned to its civil status. Out of its pre-war population of twenty or thirty thousand, hardly more than a hundred remained. I cannot remember having seen a civilian.

It is a true medieval city, built on a hill, surrounded by a wall, divided by a river. Already an old town in the 9th century, it was the birthplace of the French kingdom. Here the three grandsons of Charlemagne met in A. D. 843 and divided their father's empire among them, and Charles II became the first king of France. On the low-lying hills that at a distance of a few miles surround the city, the same giant of whom I have spoken, has been at work on a bizarre scheme of landscape gardening. He has used zig-zags and curves and angles until the whole resembles a masterpiece of Futurist art. Laterally it is a fascinating exhibition of military construction. Here one can find things, too. I am no collector of souvenirs; hence I burdened not myself with helmets, not even with a camouflaged one, mottled with yellow and green; nor with German rifles, nor shells, nor gas masks, nor boots with feet still in them. Those last were a temptation, I will admit. There was but one thing I wanted, but at the last moment I did not have nerve enough to take; that was a gold tooth. A soldier I met at Verdun had a couple. One can paw around in almost any shell hole and find one or more bodies whose sole sepulcher was the layer of dirt that some

ECONOMY and EFFICIENCY are points in favor of FISHER'S BLEND FLOUR

By using FISHER'S BLEND, in preference to ordinary flour, the Day Lumber Company at Big Lake, Wash., effected a very substantial saving. More and larger loaves of better bread were obtained. "AND WE HAD NO WASTE," writes the Lumber Company's Baker, "ALL THE BREAD I MADE WAS EATEN BY THE MEN."

MORE LOAVES AND NO WASTE—REAL ECONOMY

If reasonable care is exercised in the baking, housewives will find FISHER'S BLEND the most economical flour that it is possible to buy.

succeeding shell had scattered over them. But when it came to picking the dirt away from teeth to see whether they were gold or not, I balked. A grisly ghost story of Marion Crawford's called "The Screaming Skull" kept recurring to me, and whether it was latent superstition or inherent delicacy, neither of which I had been aware of possessing. I did not attempt any amateur dentistry.

I had promised the fellows at the office to bring them some souvenirs so I got a few coins and half a dozen buttons off some German prisoners who were clearing up barbed wire entanglements in one of the fields outside of Verdun. There were eight or nine of us including the soldier with the German teeth, whom we had picked up somehow and who had appointed himself our unofficial guide. He was an excellent fellow, a jolly comrade and had attained the standards of morality and immorality which active military life cause most of us to acquire. He had taken the pains to provide himself with plenty of free cigarettes from the K. of C., these being the coin used in the purchase of souvenirs. "They have been combed pretty thoroughly already," he said, "but some of them have rings still, probably. What if they don't want to sell 'em. Why, just take 'em and give them three or four cigarettes. You ought to have seen what we got when they first came in! I have half a dozen watches and sold four, but two I'm going to take back home."

Well, we went thru that crowd like a flock of crows picking up the final shreds of what had been a fine feast. The French guards looked on with listless interest. It was not an edifying spectacle, but it added another souvenir to several others that I have of things as they really happen.

Following this we walked back to the railroad station, and those of us who were starting back for Paris shook hands with those who were staying, wished each other a speedy release from service, or as one fellow wittily termed it, from "serfice," and said good-bye.

All this has been very poorly written; I have left out a great deal; I have omitted all reference to the great underground citadel, which makes Verdun a city impregnable. But the boys who are home can surely tell so much more about this place than I have felt like saying as little as possible. It is their story.

It had begun to rain again before we had got back to Ste. Wenehould; it was a dreary drizzle at Suippes; the trees and houses were dripping at St. Hilaire-an-Temple; and at Chalons where we had to lie over about four hours the ground had reached the peculiar semi-fluid state which I am sure is found only in France.

The navy is a rare sight evidently in Chalons for at the Red Cross there the French lady who sold supper tickets was not going to sell me one at first. "for," she said, "you are not in military uniform," and when I explained that I was a section of the American navy, she said it was the first specimen she had
