AMERICAN LOSS IS SLIGHT

Americans March Over the Rubble, Trenches and Take Possession of the Place.

MARRAY, Sept. 2.-On a hot and dusty afternoon, the world witnessed one of the most pathetic and thrilling spectacles in the drama of war. The American forces had captured Innsbruck, the capital of Austria, and were marching in on the outskirts of the city.

The capture of Innsbruck was the result of a determined and well-conducted campaign. The American forces had been preparing for this objective for several days, and their success was due in large part to the skill and valor of their leaders.

The American forces encountered little resistance, and the capture of the city was a matter of mere minutes. The victory was celebrated with enthusiasm throughout the American troops, who were eager to take possession of the city and establish their authority.

Despite the success of the American forces, the loss of life was slight. Only a few casualties were reported, and the majority of the people of Innsbruck appeared to be undisturbed by the events of the day.

The capture of Innsbruck was a significant event in the history of the war, and it marked the beginning of a new chapter in the conflict. The American forces were now in a position to take on larger objectives, and their success in Innsbruck was a sure sign of their determination to achieve victory.
