Chicago Times-Herald. "No country of Europe obtains its food so cheap or in such abundance as Great Britain," writes Mulhall, the statistician...

The peasant who takes a sad comfort in the thought that the rich are growing richer and the poor poorer, will have a special reason for feeling increased at Mulhall's figures...

But here is a curious fact which would seem to show at first sight that the beneficiaries had not availed themselves of their advantage—consumption of grain per inhabitant is less now than it was in 1879...

For confirmation let us turn to some other tables. Fruit is still considered a luxury, as meat once was, but the consumption of fruit and vegetables per head in Great Britain is twelve times what it was forty years ago...

Following is a table on other luxuries become necessities, the figures indicating consumption per inhabitant:

But Great Britain sells as well as buys, and the question may be asked, Has she not suffered losses by the fall in prices which offset her gains?...
