For Vice-President THEODORE ROOSEVELT, Of New York.

Marquis Ro's head is level if his eyes are not.

One might think that the Populists were in power in England, judging by the wonderful muddle made over the landing of the Anglo-Indian troops at Shanghai.

Now if Texas will only vote Republican the world will be prepared to believe that modern ideas are beginning to penetrate the mediæval darkness of the great Southwest.

Notwithstanding poor Mr. Bryan's plaintive cries about the scarcity of money, we are able to ship a few of our surplus millions to the less prosperous countries of Europe without any disturbance of the money market.

The sensational Shanghai correspondents, having been deprived of their opportunities to longer delude an anxious world by lurid stories of Boxer atrocities at Peking, are turning their attention to the Russians, whose mode of warfare affords them a fertile field for the play of their vivid imaginations.

With America preparing to ship large quantities of bacon and bullets to China, Germany loading ten transports with horses and military supplies, at San Francisco, and Russia already seizing new territory, there appears to be something in the wind besides the mere rescue of the legionnaires imprisoned at Peking.

JUSTICE FOR LYNCHERS.

Philadelphia Times. Texas has awakened to a sense of her honor and dignity, and set the whole South an example by convicting three men for participating in a "lynching bee." They have all been sentenced to life imprisonment, and hereafter these acts of lawlessness will be deprived of their jocosely quality in Texas.

The very nature of a lynching tends to prevent the law from being executed upon those who take part in it. When the victim of it is already a prisoner, the officers charged with his restraint and protection are not only too weak and few to resist a mob, but are in most cases in passive and sometimes in active sympathy with the lynchers. The jury of inquest is drawn from the very men who aided in the deed, and if any of them become known to the law the trial jury is made up of the very persons who are in the same case as the prisoners and could easily pass from the box to the dock, so that conviction is practically impossible. Besides that, the sympathy of the community is with the lynchers, and they, generally speaking, are only the active voice of the majority, which encourages the act and supports the perpetrators of it. Nevertheless, in the face of these opposed conditions, Texas has secured three convictions, and "more power to her arm" in like causes for the future is the encouraging comment she will hear from all sides.

In a recent strong but harmful book a distinguished writer has made a plea of justification of lynching, whose pages are often referred to in the South as palliating the crime. In it is the story of an upright man and law-abiding, who by every means at his command opposed lynching. He was about to be married when his fiancée became the victim of an outrage, which in the South as elsewhere takes place with unforgivable crimes. The lover led the lynchers and allowed no man to aid him in putting the rope around the guilty negro's neck. Then he boldly avowed his share in the deed, and an approving people endorsed it as a righteous act. The fault with this story is that it begs the whole question by making it personal to every reader, who is asked in the directest terms would you, in that man's place, have done the same? The answer, having regard to the qualities of human nature must be almost invariably yes. But that reply has no bearing upon the outrage done to justice and evades the vital issue concerned.

The law in the South provides for the criminal's punishment and for this offense has but a single movement, and it leads to death by execution. The object of it, if guilty, cannot escape, and it matters nothing to him whether it be delayed or come promptly. He has but one life and it stands forfeited. The lesson of a legal execution must always be more impressive and salutary than the prompt justice of a mob, and it is partly for this reason that lynching is a crime. It may have been some satisfaction to the community to allow the hero of the story to execute with his own hand an act of vengeance, but the offense to law was a high price to pay for the satisfaction.

If the law is supported by the people its deliberative methods will secure all the vengeance they can achieve by the wildest deeds, but if its provisions be broken the arm of justice is paralyzed in all its functions and a scoff is made of her. Therefore, Texas, by these convictions, has done well, and she has answered the problem in the apologue with an emphatic No.
