How easy it is for a poor man to decide what a rich one should do with his money. Andrew Carnegie comes nearest the ideal rich man, in popular estimation. There are diverse opinions about his judgment in the methods he employs for distributing his wealth, but all agree that he is doing the proper thing in getting rid of it. There is very little manifestation of real gratitude to Mr. Carnegie, even in communities that are recipients of his bounty. In some cases his proffered benefactions have been promptly declined, and in others hot discussions have arisen over the propriety of accepting thm. His offer of many millions of dollars to Scottish universities was at first received as a grievous affront, and New York is still debating the question of acepting his offer of several millions.

But while the present year has been phenomenal in the number of lavish gifts by rich men, for good purposes, we hear no general expression of gratitude except in the case of Mr. Carnegie. For example, John D. Rockefeller has given several million dollars for educational purposes, and he has devoted other large sums to benevolent uses. The public judgment, guaged by the average expression, is that he ought to have given a great deal more. J. Pierpont Morgan has been noted for several years as a generous giver in right directions, and he has just made a special donation of one million dollars to Harvard University. Probably there is gratitude for the munificent gift within the inner circle of Harvard, but there is no evidence of it outside.

In passing judgment upon the benefactions of rich men we are apt to lose sight of the fact that wealth like poverty, is relative. Mr. Morgan's wealth possibly reaches fifty millions of dollars and Mr. Rockefeller's five times that sum. In his single donation of one million to Harvard Morgan gave away two per cent of his wealth. Rockefeller's gifts to Chicago University equal two and a half per cent of his wealth. Each of them might have given five, ten or twenty times as much and they ought to have done it. That is substantially the average opinion, as expressed.

Having in mind the fact that wealth is relative, suppose we take some of our own medicine, that we offer gratuitously of our own wealth with the Morgans and Rockefellers. The cause of education needs money in every community in the United States. The needs of Harvard and Chicago universities are examples, not exceptions. The smaller communities do not need millions, but they need thousands, and even hundreds. The opportunity for doing good in the cause of education is often quite as ripe here in Los Angeles as it is in Boston or Chicago. A citizen who is comparatively rich here, or one in moderate circumstances, or even a poor man, has the same chance as a multi-millionaire to give a percentage of what he has to the cause of education.

The subject is worthy of earnest thought. Why not try the experiment of figuring up our individual wealth and then relatively giving as much as the Rockefellers and Morgans by donating a percentage of it to the cause of education.

If Portland business men are sincere in their desire to get at the heart of the situation, and find out what measures will best build up that city and the entire state, surely the transportation problem cannot be ignored. Figures reprinted from the Oregonian prove that Puget sound ports have taken from Portland. At that time there was a bill should be tributary to an Oregon seaport. There must be a reason and a remedy. If the gentlemen in charge of the program have not yet secured all the speakers they can find time for we would suggest that Mr. Cotton, counsel for the O. R. & N., and Mr. Fenton, counsel for the Southern Pacific, be included. Mr. Cotton will perhaps repeat the statements he made before the House of Representatives, at the last session of the legislature, concerning the expenses of operating his line into Portland. At that time there was a bill pending providing that for each train of thirty coaches there should be one engineer, one fireman, one conductor and two brakemen; for each ten cars or fraction thereof over thirty cars there should be provided one extra brakeman. Mr. Cotton vigorously opposed the bill, and in his able convincing way, proved to the legislators that the grade of the O. R. & N. into Portland was down level and that sixty cars could be handled with safety with the same crew specified for thirty cars. He said that the haul presented no difficulties, and, it is to be presumed, a minimum operating expense. Then Mr. Fenton will tell of the line which he represents. If he will recall his arguments presented forcefully to the legislature he will say that the Southern Pacific road in Oregon is under heavy operating expenses. He will tell at length of the difficult mountain hauls. He will tell of the awful cost of handling freight and passenger trains over the mountain haul entail, he will state that it is of such proportions that had the bill fixing the passenger rate at three cents a mile had been passed road would have been thrown into the hands of receivers. Then the question will be pertinent: If it costs the Southern Pacific so much and the O. R. & N. so little, how is it that wheat can be hauled to San Francisco and be worth more to the producer than at Portland? The answer would be of interest to a vast region.

Stories of the Hour

PUGNO PUGNAS PUGNAT.

And the African War Stopped While He Whipped a Good English Fighter.

"Tell you something about the Boer war," replied a husky-looking veteran who had just returned from South Africa to a reporter recently. "Well, it's hard to know where to begin, but if you want a sample of good old Yankee grit, I can tell you of an incident that comes pretty near being the limit. And it's true too, every word of it.

"The hero of the yarn," he went on, "was a young fellow named Joe Hawkins, who was raised on a ranch in Texas. He had seen a good deal of rough life on the plains, and his reputation fr ability to handle his fists, as well as the undisputed fact that he was the best writer and surest shot in the regiment had won for him the outward respect, at least of every man in the Border Mounted Rifles, or Border Horse, as the regiment was more familiarly known. Just how he came to be serving in the ranks so far from home no one knew, but it wasn't considered healthy to show an undue interest in Joe's private affairs, and no attempt was ever made to solve the mystery.

"At the time Joe joined the regiment there was a big burly, loud-mouthed Englishman acting as boatman to one of the officers, who had the name of being a fighter. I had never seen him fight, but he was credited with being able to do any man in the corps and several of us American chaps used to speculate as to what would happen in case of a mixup between quiet Joe and 'Liverpool Bill,' as the Englishman was known.

"Well, we didn't have long to wait. Things had been running pretty quiet for some time and we had nothing to do but escort convoys for so long that we were heartily sick of the business, and longing for a brush with the enemy, when along came orders for the Border Horse to join Knox's brigade, which was scouring the northern part of the Orange Free State in pursuit of DeWit. We came up with the column about dusk one evening and soon learned that the famous leader with some fifteen hundred men, had been located in the hills that border the Vaal, and that an attempt was to be made at daybreak next morning to drive the enemy back across the Vaal into the Transvaal by way of Schulmans Drift, where General French with the pick of the British cavalry was expected to be waiting for them.

"The details of the battle of Witt Kop are too well known for me to attempt to describe it. It took us nearly three days to drive the Dutchmen back across the river and many as good boys as ever held a rifle were left dead upon the field, while to make matters worse, through some misunderstanding General French did not put in an appearance, and another good chance to get DeWit was lost.

"It was toward the close of the second day's fighting that the meeting which all knew must come sooner or later between Joe and Liverpool Bill took place. The Border Horse had been given the position of honor and led the advance. We had been fighting hard all day, and had finally taken up a position on a kopje and were having a duel at long range with the Dutchmen, who were on another kopje some 1200 yards away. The men on both sides were keeping pretty close under cover, taking advantage of every rock or ant heap that could be used as shelter, and not much execution was being done. Every time a man showed himself on either side, however, the fire broke out with renewed vigor, and it behooved a fellow who had any respect for his life to lie low.

"Now, about one hundred yards in front of our main body there was a long flat rock which would afford excellent shelter to a man lying at full length behind it, but there was room for one man only, and from its exposed position the place was practically dangerous for any one who did not keep well under cover. To reach the rock it was necessary to go over a clear unbroken stretch of ground in full view of the enemy.

"By one of those strange coincidences which will happen, Joe and 'Liverpool Bill' started for that rock at the same instant, though from different parts of the line, and reached it after running the gauntlet of a heavy fire at almost precisely the same moment. Each claimed the point as his own, and neither would give way. We could not hear what was said, but we could see that they were arguing excitedly, while the Dutchmen were taking advantage of the situation and were concentrating their fire upon the exposed men. How they escaped will always remain a mystery to me. That one must yield soon became evident, else neither would get away alive, but both men were stubborn and we knew it. In our anxiety to see the outcome we all ceased firing.

"Imagine our surprise when, after another moment's talk, both men sprang to their feet, pulled off their jackets and began a fistic battle to settle the matter then and there. The Dutchmen seeing the two men fully exposed, at first redoubled their fire, but as the real situation finally became clear to them they, too, ceased firing and came out from under cover to watch the fight. And a hard fight it was, too, in full sight of both armies. For a long time it was even betting who would have the best of it, but finally, just as Joe caught the Englishman a stunning blow on the jaw with his right, 'Liverpool Bill' in attempting to dodge, tripped and went over backward, striking his head against the rock with a force which put him out of business.

"To the cheer of both Dutch and English Joe carried his insensible antagonist to a position of safety, and then, returned to his place behind the rock, he donned his coat, picked up his rifle and with a wave of his hat gave the signal which once more set the battle in motion.—Boston Herald.

REMEMBER AT LAST.

Though it happened in one of Detroit's swell hotels, neither of the principals belongs here. He had just seated himself at the dinner table when she and another lady come in with the usual flourish of handsome and well-dressed women.

He turned a shade or two paler. After conning here menu she looked across the table and her face took on a puzzled expression. When their eyes met during the meal each pretended to be studying the tablecloth of the opposite wall. He left first, and she watched through the doors.

"Amie," she said to her companion, "I certainly know that man, but I can't for the life of me place him. I think he knew me, too, but I couldn't bow to him unless I were sure, could I? You know that I never snub any one."

He wandered into the parlor later while the women were there, looking a little to fierce for congeniality, and got away as soon as he could. She again gave out the conviction that she knew him, and wondered where it was and who he could be.

"Never mind," said the companion, he's nthing to us. Forget him."

"Oh, foolish, it isn't that, but you know how it is when your memory betrays you, and I don't want him to think me rude. But hubby will be here tonight and I'll have him find out all about it."

Half an hour later she smothered a scream and rushed imploringly at the other woman. "For heaven's sake, Amie, don't you say a word to my hubby about that fellow. It just came to me."

"Well."

"He was my first husband in Chicago."—Detroit Free Press.

THE PORTER'S CHARITABLE VIEW.

One by one the travellers entered the sleeping car bound for the exposition.

"Porter," said a fat man.

"Yes, sah."

"Put me off at Buffalo."

The porter showed two rows of ivories in an affected grin.

"Dat's purty good, sah," he said.

An "octopustic" looking man came in and looked at the porter with evidences of a smile twitching around the corners of his mouth.

"Porter," he said.

"Yes, sah."

"Put me off at Buffalo."

Then came a woman—a brazen woman—who sprung the same old gag, followed by the two travelling men, who drew cuts at the further end of the car to see who would have the honor of indulging in the witticism. And through it all the porter smiled. Finally, he came over to my berth and sat down.

"Dey's some mighty humorous people in dis world, sah," he said.

"Very," I answered, as a tall man, faultlessly attired, came in with his head high in the air and passed us without a word.

The porter looked surprised.

"Say, boss," he said, following the tall man with his eyes, "do you s'pose it am possible dat boy never heard of de 'put-me-off' gag?"

"It's possible," I answered, "but not probable."

The porter lapsed into silence, and thought for a moment, and then his face brightened.

"Say, boss," he suddenly exclaimed, "I've got it. I'll bet $10 dat man's a Southanah, an' won't speak to a niggah!"—Indianapolis Sun.

BAD FOR THE BANKERS.

Business is bad at Monte Carlo. Not that the roulette and trent-et-quarante tables lack patrons, but that a number of these patrons have taken to winning largely and thereby upsetting all the banks's calculations. Baron Ephrussi, son-in-law to one of the Rothschilds, won $250,000 last season, and his coolness and immense capital make the bankers despair of recouping the loss. When he loses he plays on calmly until luck changes, as it is sure to do in time. To win at Monte Carlo requires a capital about 250 times as large as one's earnings.

Baron Carlo di Rufini, son of the well known Italian statesman, was another heavy winner. He, too, was wise enough to chose a father worth some $40,000,000 before presuming to buck the Monte Carlo tiger. On the other hand the small players, who start with a few hundred dollars apiece, are almost sure to "go broke." A short run of ill luck cleans them out, and "the subsequent proceedings interest them no more." It is from these small fry that the bank derived its net gain of $4,500,000 last season. This was much less than was expected, in view of the fact that it was an exposition year. The winnings in the last such year, 1889, were $7,400,000.

Some women will waste baby milk on a pet poodle and then wonder why their children grow up to be so worthless.
