Washington Notes

(Continued from Page 2.) ward social anarchy. This, it will be remembered, was the fear expressed between the lines of the President's annual message, and this it was that called forth the strong word of caution from the Presidential pen against the tendency toward too drastic and widely divergent laws enacted by the various states and all aimed at the cure of business evils, but in themselves so drastic and impracticable as to threaten the commercial structure of the nation.

Hunting and hunting parties seem to be all the rage at this time here in Washington. Following the President's lead, great numbers of government officials have slipped away from their desks for a week end in the mountains of Virginia, that State being the nearest with anything like virgin forests. Those whose duties have prevented their absenting themselves at this time read the telegraphic reports of the hunting excursions of the various parties with avidity and curse the luck that keeps them here. With the majority of the hunters, President Roosevelt's favorite sport seems to have taken firm hold. Nearly all are after a brace or so of wild turkeys to show when they get back to town, but they are all keen after the fat quail and pheasants which abound in the Virginia hills. The hunting lodges owned or rented by various enthusiasts are crowded with guests, while others have put up at farm houses or at the inns and hotels scattered over the State. The Virginia Hot Springs, a resort much affected by critical Washington of late, is in the heart of the wildest portion of the State, and there is the headquarters for not a few nimrods. While the President was at Pine Knot he also kept open house for his friends, but owing to the large party which he took with him the lodge was too crowded to permit of his entertaining any outsiders over one day. It looks as though the fall will keep up throughout the hunting season, but if they all have as bad luck as the President it is not likely that there will be another dearth of game next year. Meanwhile the Virginia authorities are finding no fault with this latest craze, for every addition to the force of hunters means the issue of another hunting license.

Great Northern Contests Right of Minnesota to Interfere.

ST. PAUL, Jan. 3.—The Great Northern has begun to contest the right of the state of Minnesota to prevent the road from making an issue of $60,000,000 stock. In compliance with the action brought by Attorney General Young in Ramsey county, W. R. Begg, general counsel of the railroad, appeared before Judges Shallam and Orr in the district court today and asked for a continuance of the matter until Tuesday. Hearing was granted on an order to show cause why the company should not be restrained from issuing stock. The district court after hearing Attorney Begg, granted the stay.
