PORTLAND, Feb. 7.—"We can see one good feature in the food for Valley poultry raisers," said a Front street commission man this morning.

"I notice that livestock shipments have been suspended owing to stoppage in transportation."

Egg receipts seem to be growing heavier, and retailers are not rushing to stock up heavily. As a result there is a widely expressed opinion on the street that the high prices of the past week will be maintained with difficulty.

A MEETING IN WILDERNESS

that she cared for you when you were boy and girl. And I always hoped you would come back and make her happy." Walter closed his eyes. It seemed to his brother, watching him, that he could see the opposing forces marshaled themselves beneath the smooth brow. On the one side wealth and dignity, yes, and substantial worth and true affection, the glittering lure of cities, the charm of the ordered life, the appeal of books, of travel, of art, the beguilement of cultivated voices—all these called to one who had been born their son. And what opposed them? The doctor heard the wind in its long sweep through the trees, heard the remote thunder of the falls. Dew and starlight, dust and heat and storm, the fragrance of pines, the matching of man's cunning against the instinct of the shy things of the forest and the stream, the conquest of the forbidding earth, the facing of hardship, the overcoming of danger—were these commands of an older parentage yet than civilization's? When Walter's eyes opened they did not look at once toward his brother but turned, as if of instinct, toward the window. Jim's glance followed. A face, white, strained, tragic, was framed in the little square. Behind it the night loomed mysterious. "Dulcie," called Walter. She came with swift obedience, the primitive woman, simple, subservient, loving. He took her hand and held it lovingly as she stood by the bed. "Dulcie, tell my brother Jim that you and I are going to stay in the woods together." Happiness leaped in and rose to her face. She sank upon her knees and kissed his hand.
