IS NOTABLE SPEECH

Delivered by Member on the Irish Question.

NO NECESSITY OF SINN FEIN

Samuel Young of East Cavan Declares in Place of Disintegration That Ireland Wants Consolidation—Too Many Organizations.

DUBLIN, Oct. 10.—Considerable attention is being paid in nationalist circles in Ulster to a speech addressed to his constituents in East Cavan by Samuel Young, M. P.

Mr. Young said they had too many organizations in Ireland. There was no necessity for Sinn Fein. It was impossible that they should shut themselves out from England. The nationalist party had not been a failure. They had secured the best land laws in the world for the Irish tenants. He thought the Irish counsel bill had been offered in good faith and should have been accepted. He did not think Ireland could succeed by violence in word or action. She was too weak. Ireland was only like a little dog in the presence of a mastiff. He thought they should succeed best by conciliation to the extent even of differentiating between the king and those who hitherto had refused their claims. England was too powerful to be intimidated by bluster, and would not submit to be bullied. He thought also that nationalists should welcome assistance from any quarter. There should be a clear definition of what they wanted.

There were not a few in England and Ireland who would assert that they wanted separation. That was that they wanted their own king, their own army and navy, their own customs and excise. That surely would be madness, and must operate against them. The fact was they wanted a greater union with the people of Great Britain, who had had a long trial at the government of this country and had sadly failed. They wanted a parliament in Ireland with delegated authority, to manage all purely Irish affairs which they had the ability and the disposition to undertake. They did not want so much separation as had been granted to Canada or the Australian colonies. They wanted the king of England to be their king, the army and navy to be their army and navy and to contribute their full share of men to the forces; and they wanted the excise and customs to obtain alike over the three kingdoms.

They wanted such a division of labor as might relieve the imperial chamber of much work it was now unfit to cope with. In place of disintegration, they wanted consolidation. If these, their desires, were conceded, he could see no reason why they should not glory in British arms and in everything that pertained to the greatness of that empire of which, under happier auspices, they should form a part.
