CENTRAL BANK.

SPRINGFIELD, Ill., Nov. 23.—William Barrett Ridgeley, comptroller of the currency, talked last night before the Ad Men's Club on the financial crisis.

Mr. Ridgeley declared it as his belief that a large central bank of issue was the proper solution of the situation. Such a bank to be entirely divorced from politics and speculation. The banking laws of the country should be changed, but he did not believe in special emergency currency unless it could be made useful at all times.

Drink of Buttermilk

[Written for the Morning Astorian.]

Enoch Quill sat on the seat of a mowing machine guiding a pair of stout farm horses and attending to the machine at the same time. The summer season had settled down from the thickens of spring and taken on that steady warmth which gives life to the creatures of earth. A thrush was piping in a tree, a robin was teaching its brood to fly. Over a blue sky sailed a white cloud, casting what seemed to Enoch to be the shadow of a huge bird. It passed, and the sun shone out seemingly brighter and warmer than before. The man reined in his horses at a turn for a rest, took off his straw hat, wiped the sweat from his brow and looked about him.

From the farmhouse beneath a clump of trees on the hill came Mabel Judd, Enoch's employer's daughter. She wore a calico dress, a cheap apron and a sunbonnet. The sun poured its rays over her and was reflected brightly from a tin bucket she carried in her hand. Her approach brought a pleased look to the young farm hand's face. The girl came on over the field where John Barleycorn stood in battle array, emerging where Enoch had left whole companies and platoons lying slaughtered on the ground. Then she came to where he sat on his iron seat, and as she looked up at him and he saw her pleasant oval face away down in the shadow cast by her sunbonnet he gasped with the great joy that was in him.

"I been churnin', Enoch," she said, "and I thought a drink o' buttermilk 'ud taste good to you."

She took the cover off and handed the bucket to him.

"Thankee, Miss Mabel," he said and drank the contents. "It's done me a heap o' good," he added, handing the bucket back to her. "I don't know but one thing that's done me more good."

"What's that?"

"Your bringin' it to me."

"Oh, that wasn't any trouble," she said, a slight red coming into her cheeks under his gaze.

"It isn't the trouble; it's the disposition to do it. I didn't know you'd keer so much."

"Oh, I s'or you out mowin' in the sun, and I thought it 'ud taste good."

There was a brief silence, which Enoch ended.

"I wished I owned a small farm o' my own."

"I wished you did, Enoch, for your sake."

This was not all the truth. She wished for the farm for her own sake as well as Enoch's. Then she might be the housewife. Enoch had never made love to her. The view Enoch took of it was that she wished it for his sake alone. He thought he would never have a farm, and without one he had no business to make love to a girl who would likely some day inherit one. He gathered up the reins.

"I'm much obliged for the buttermilk," he said.

"It wasn't any trouble," she replied mechanically and, turning, with a disappointed look on her face, went back over John Barleycorn's slain soldiers and through his waving forces that stood still defiant. Long before she reached the house she again heard the monotonous rattle of the mowing machine. Somehow the pleasure she had taken in it had gone out of it. Enoch had said nothing to warrant this change of feeling. She had drawn an inference from his manner.

Enoch finished cutting the wheat that day and received his wages. The next he was gone without bidding Mabel goodbye.

Ten years passed, and Mabel owned the farm. She managed it herself, though she hired the work done for her. One season there were no hands to be hired, and when the wheat ripened she started out with the machine to cut it herself. It was just such a morning as that on which she had had her last talk with Enoch Quill. A man—he looked like a tramp—stopped in the road and leaned over the fence near which she was driving.

"Want any hired help?" he asked.

Mabel drew rein and looked at him some time before replying. Her features were shaded by her sunbonnet.

"Seems to me," she said, "that a strong man like you ought to own a farm of his own and not go workin' for other people."

"I tried to git one and failed. I was cheated. Bad title and bad crops."

These were few words, but they told a story. After a pause the woman asked:

"How much you want?"

"Anything you like to pay."

"Well, come in here and take hold."

The man went to work, and the woman went through the wheatfield to the house. After awhile, when the sun was getting hot and the hired hand was getting thirsty, he saw her coming with a tin bucket.

"I been churnin'," she said. "Would you like some buttermilk?"

The man raised the bucket to his lips with a trembling hand. "Ten years ago," he said, "I tuk a drink o' buttermilk, and I've never forgot it."

"And I ain't forgot givin' it to you."

"You know me?"

"I knew you the minute I saw you leanin' on the fence."

"I went away to git a farm. I wanted to put you on it."

"I thought you didn't want me."

"I did."

There was a pause. The woman stooped and picked up a spear of wheat.

"Well," she said presently, "there's no use tryin' to git a farm seeln' there's one here."

And that's the end of the story.
