try in the world, commercially, politically and industrially. "Is there any ill feeling on the part of the Chinese Government relative to the restrictions which the United States have placed upon Chinese immigration?"

"None at all; we are trying to restrict it ourselves. Those who come here from China belong to the pauper classes. We are trying to stop the exodus because we do not wish for the Americans to think that we have nothing but paupers in our country. We are much more concerned in our commercial relations with the United States and our merchants doing business in America; that is China's chief concern. We wish to extend our commercial relations with this country as much as possible, and to do so, our merchants in America must be protected. Concerning this, however, we have no care, as we rely upon the fairness and justice of the American Government."
