Father: So, my son you have been fighting again, eh?
 Bob: Yes, father, I had a short set to with Jim Billings this morning.
 "Well, you remember our last conversation on this subject do you not?"
 "Yes, father, you said you'd while me till I couldn't move."
 "Ah! Your memory, I see, is still good. Go get me the rawhide. Thanks. Now, before I begin this disagreeable task, I should like to have your story, and also how many times you struck the Billings boy, for, if I remember aright, I promised you two cuts of the rawhide for every time that you hit a companion."
 "Well, it was this way: You see, Jim Billings is a republican, and I, like you, am a democrat. We got to arguing a little bit, and finally Jim said a democrat was no good on earth."
 "James said that did he?"
 "Yes, he said they were all born thieves, and that he could lick any son of a democrat that ever lived."
 "And then you fight?"
 "Well, not quite then, I told him that I was the son of a democrat, and was proud of it, and that he couldn't lick one side of me. Then he said that he could lick me if I was a democrat and had eight sides, and that my father wasn't a respectable thief anyhow, but a common venereal climber. Then we hit."
 "How, or—many times, my son, did you strike James?"
 "I counted upon high as one hundred, and then he began to gouge my eyes, and I lost track of the rest, but I am sure it was close on to a hundred."
 "My noble boy, go throw this rawhide into the fire, and then come back and hug me."
