Jealous Gold Diggers Spoil a Romance and Practice a Mean Joke---An Incident of the Early Days In Montana,

The Liars' Club met in their palatial rooms, says the Helena Inpendent, and after the usual preimlnaries, selected the liar to tell the next story. He braced him self up with a few jiggers of fine old Bourbon, and reclining upon an elegant divan, spun out the folowing tale:

"Years ago I was mining in a gulch beyond the Missouri river. I had a hard time of it getting my mine opened and lived for a week at a time on beans straight, with-out salt. But I did finally suceced. After months and months of hard and continuous labor I struck bedrock and set my sluices. | you. The first day's run I took out $1,-750 in bright, clean golddust, and after that everything was smooth sailing. Poverty and hard work were relegated to the past. I reveled in wealth and enjoyed myself as only the old placer miners know how. There was not a dance nor lorse race of any kind for miles around that I did not attend. I thought of getting married, but girls were so scarce I could not catch on. Money seemed to be the least consideration with them. Paid up $25,000.00 Any young man with a handsome face and red bandana around his neck could hold his own with the wealthiest old bach, to be found just too sweet for any use. Talk kin blossoms!
