

"Where Rolls the Oregon."

AT GREENHORN

On the Summit of the Blue Mountains

OREGON'S YOUNGEST TOWN

But the Most Promising Infant in the Nursery.

(Journal Special Service.)
GREENHORN, Aug. 9.—How many people in Portland know there is such a town in Oregon as Greenhorn? Yet there is such a town and it is a good lively youngster, too. It is situated on the summit of the Blue Mountains, about on the line between Baker and Grant Counties. It is barely six months old and yet it has a population of between 800 and 1000. It was platted last winter and the first houses built required the removal of from five to ten feet of snow to find a foundation. Today it has good hotels, several fine general merchandise stores, a post-office with daily mail, express office, saloons (of course), and all the necessary adjuncts of a good live mining town. Its growth has been phenomenal. If it were located in Alaska, the inaccessible portions of Idaho, or way up on the Porcupine or Pease Rivers, the dispatches would have a great deal to say about it, and the rush of dog-sledges, goat-trains, boats and wild-eyed visionaries, with a scoop shovel in one hand and a barley sack in the other, and their minds filled with Pictorian dreams of fabulous wealth and a speedy return to the girls they left behind them, would equal the Klondike or Nome stampedes. Fortunately, Greenhorn has had no boom, but has been BUILT UPON THE MERITS of its surroundings. There is not a camp on the Coast today that has so bright a future. Within the town limits is the famous Worley mine just opened with a fine vein of ore running from $25 to $500 a ton in gold. A half mile away is the Payche, recently sold by its discoverers, Pat Kelley and Tom Passet, to Omaha parties for $25,000, and which now shows at a depth of 100 feet a ledge 11 feet wide carrying $100 per ton in gold and copper. Just below the Payche is the Banquette, now being opened through a 1100-foot tunnel, and which has produced from surface workings, probably $75,000. Adjoining this is the Snow Creek, a fine property just opened, and a claim owned by the Marshall Brothers that is very high grade. Above the town is the Diadem owned by Sumpter people, and adjoining it is the Big Johnny, opened by that old prospector of the Greenhorn range, Jack Zwank. Near the Worley is the Rockefeller group owned by General Compton, Theo. Barker and others of Portland, which is one of the great mines of that section. The Blackhawk, a mile below, has a two-stamp Tremaine mill, and its ores, taken from the shaft, have so far more than paid for the expense of sinking. The Phoenix, a mile to the east, is taking out ore with over $100 to the ton, and lots of it; and the Don Juan, adjoining the Phoenix, has struck its vein, which was left, and has its ten-stamp mill going steadily. The Virginia, only a mile from the new town, has some fine ore, but is idle, owing to the burning of its hoisting station a short time ago. The Golden Eagle, owned by a company in The Dalles, has PRODUCED GOOD MONEY and will astonish even its owners when sinking operations are resumed. A mile and a half to the northeast lies the Golden Gate group, the Belcher and the Double Eagle, the latter with seven claims, and all with good ore. Near these is the "Sixteen to One," a claim now being opened by E. J. Kelley, one of the original locators of the Don Juan. Besides these are the June Bug, the Butterfly and a hundred other promising prospect claims. Then there are other claims a few miles distant that will run way up in silver.

How many Oregonians know that there is even one silver mine in Oregon? The Jack Power's group, the Cayuse and Brindle Horse, each show ores averaging over 100 ounces of silver to the ton. The Inter-Mountain and Intrinsic show ores as good, while some shipments of selected ore from these claims have run up to 1800 ounces, or $800 per ton, gold basis. The Tempest is some distance away, around to the north of Greenhorn Mountain, but still a property tributary to the little town. Among these properties are some that will be worked out in 50 years, and it is safe to say they will eventually produce more gold than the big placers of the Klondike, or the golden beaches of Nome. Greenhorn will yet become a name as common as Dawson, and the mines around the big old mountain will go far towards putting Oregon in the front rank as a gold producer. Unfortunately most of the Eastern Oregon mines are owned by Eastern people and the wealth coming out of the ground goes to swell the fortunes of people in the East as well as the capitalists of Canada, France and Germany.

Not feeling that he was called upon to feed pork to bears he ran after the bear, flourishing his brush hook and shouting at the top of his voice.
