TO SAVE FROM LIVES OF SIN. MISSION OF JUVENILE COURT IS TO TURN BOYS FROM EVIL WAYS BEFORE CRIME IN THEIR SOUL DELIGHT - FEW FAIL TO RESPOND TO WISE DIRECTION.

The prevention of crime by the establishment of houses of correction, reform schools and aid societies for the care of children, are plans carried out in every state in the Union.

A scheme found to work much good in the juvenile court, which has been adopted by several large cities of this country.

The aims of the juvenile court are mainly to show the youthful offenders the error of their ways and by appealing to their honor, causing them to reform.

Perhaps one of the most successful reformers of boys in the west is Ben B. Lindsey, judge of the juvenile court of Denver, Col.

A boy charged with truancy, theft or even more serious offenses, is taken before the juvenile court. The judge does not berate him and call to mind punishment and the usual heretofore talk to the child of what he knows he is capable of doing.

There are exceptional cases where punishment is necessary, and the offender is sent to the reformatory and is held up as an example to the others.

"SUNDAY CLOSING WILL DO HARM." Judge Lindsey has written several articles concerning the child, and in one, "The Child, the Parent and the Law," he quotes the following from James Whitcomb Riley, which is a beautiful expression of a mother's love for her youngsters:

"Pears to me all chillun's good Ef they are only understood. Even the bad ones seem to me, Is just as good as they kin be."

A boy, according to Judge Lindsey, cannot be considered bad just because he pilfers a candy store or robs a melon patch. He is doing wrong, but it is more excessive animal spirit—love for adventure—rather than any thought of wrongdoing.

"You can put the candy factory," he says, "the watermelon patch or the ice cream parlor, rather than the ten commandments any day, and the former will win every time."

To those interested in the movement for the establishment of a juvenile court in Portland, the following from the report of Judge Lindsey for 1903 is interesting:

Delinquent children brought into court, 355 boys and 31 girls; dismissed and acquitted, 41 boys and 4 girls; committed to state industrial school at time of trial and not put on probation (less than 6 per cent), 21 boys and 4 girls; placed on probation at same time without commitment, 337 boys and 23 girls; probationers of 1903, committed for renewed offense or broken promise, 15 boys and no girls.

Speaking of the Lewis and Clark fair, Mr. Nast said: "The closing of the exposition on Sundays will result in harm. The attendance at the Portland fair will be drawn largely from the Pacific coast," he said. "I do not look for a very large attendance at either the St. Louis or Portland expositions from Omaha. You see we have had one exposition and the people are inclined to stay at home. I am afraid St. Louis will be disappointed in her crowds this summer, but along with this respect the visitors will fill the city. Persons would rather travel when it isn't too hot."
