It may easily be imagined that some of the measures were not framed with sufto fit into the general scheme of the system, and that conflicts of authority necessarily arose from time to time. Such a conflict has existed for some years between the two supreme powers, the board of regents and the department of superintendence. To abolish that conflict, and ncidentally increase the patronage of the Republicans, a bill has been introduced in the legislature which seeks to unify the system by making both boards subordinate to a commissioner of education, whose authority would be practically supreme. Of course, the Demodrats and the board of regents are making desperate efforts to defeat the proposed legislation, and its adoption is, to say the least, extremely doubtful. To give their opposition greater power and a more unselfish appearance, the Democrats favor a non-partisan commission of three.
