The Bogus Count de Moncade

CLIME as a profession was adopted by younger sons of noble families in France in the eighteenth century. When taken, if the authority of relatives could command it, instead of dying on the gallows or being broken on the wheel, these noble rascals were shipped to the colonies...

an accurate description of the son and his mistress. The marquis had no sooner read his manuscript than he sent confidential agents to every town in Rotterdam, Amsterdam and The Hague in the hope of getting traces of the fugitives; but no clue was obtained...

shocking with emotion, she said to the marquis as she drew the promise of marriage from her bosom and gave it to him; that she knew too well the heart of her lover longer to have need of it. The ambassador, whose tears were flowing in abundance, stood transfixed at such an exhibition of grandeur of soul.
