WHILE OWNERS FIGHT COW DIES OF OLD AGE

Bovine Break Into Cornfield Was Followed by Raptile
Proceedings.

(Journal Special Service.)
Genoa, Ill., Jan. 12.—The circuit court has just settled a case involving 37 cents, all about a cow. The case has been in the courts for years and the cow died long before justice was obtained from any of them.

Many years ago a cow owned by George Sylvester, a farmer residing near here, got into the corn patch of Carl Zundt, who was his neighbor. The cow broke through the fence and when Zundt discovered her she was calmly munching the tender blades of the sweet corn that he had planted in his garden. Zundt immediately constituted himself a pound master and estimating the damage to his corn at 27 cents he refused to give up the cow until Sylvester had come up with the money.

The master stood thus for several days and the frequent threats Zundt made up to the cow, as obstinate as Sylvester was in his refusal to pay the 37 cents. Rather than pay this money Sylvester swore he would go bankrupt fighting the case. He employed an attorney, and the cow was replevined.

Zundt then, swearing to get even, went to a lawyer and the case was heard before the local courts and decided first in favor of one party, then, on appeal and retrial in favor of the other party.

Four years ago the old cow died while the suit was still in progress and she had been dead since. The case was still in progress and had been given over to an amount for both parties running into the thousands.

Yesterday the supreme court gave judgment in favor of Sylvester and Zundt has lost not only his corn worth 37 cents, his several days' care of the cow but court costs and lawyers' fees amounting to a very respectable sum. Zundt is practically bankrupt and cannot afford the cost of further litigation.

Sylvester's farm is badly mortgaged. In short, the cow's execution has financially ruined both families and no one has profited except the lawyers, and the cow.
