Robinson, a novice at the saloon busiess, invested all his money in the place.

Robinson went to the city license in spectors, stated that he had left the place, and asked that the license be transferred to McClosky. This could not be done, and the inspectors notified him that as the license was in his name and he had quit the business, McClosky had no right to continue to conduct the saloon; the inspectors telephoned to the police that McClosky was running the saloon without a license Instead of removing the license which was in Robinson's name and ordering McClosky to close the place, Chief of Police Hunt ordered Patrolman Blanchett to go to the saloon and put a padlock on the doors,

After the saloon was closed there was Closky, Paul Wessinger and Chief Hunt were prominent figures. McClosky was loud in his threats to bring suit against the city for locking up his premises, and talked so convincingly that Chief Hupt, realizing that he was wrong, sent an door, and peace brooded over the bar,
