William McBride, suspected of being the smeak thief who has been responsible for the wholesale thefts in lodging-houses throughout the city, was arrested last night by Detectives Kienlin and Inskeep and lodged in jail. Two bundles, containing 18 suits of clothing, two overcosts, 13 pairs of shoes and other wearing apparel, were found in the room. Wrapped in two silk handkerchiefs the detectives discovered a revolver of large caliber, and a gold and a silver watch were found in McBride's pockets.

An investigation by the police showed that the gold watch had been stolen November 2, 1906, from J. Gravini, 221½ Water street. The clothing is of various makes and bears the labels of clothlers throughout the city. The stock of shoes includes everything from tans to patent leathers.

The accused man had been residing in the Empire lodging-house for two weeks, and the suspicions of the preprietor were aroused by McBride's action in daily carrying clothing to his room. Belle ing that the man was a crook, the hotelkeeper notified the police last night and the arrest foliowed, McBride will be held without bail pending a thorough investigation. The prisoner declares that he purchased the garments and shoes in Bellingham, Washington, where he says he formerly resided.

AMATEUR COMPANY MAKES PROFESSIONAL HIT

Shakespeare Club Produces Twelfth Night in True Dramatic Style.

The Shakespeare club of the Portland Academy made its initial bow before the public last night, presenting the Elizabethan comedy "Tweifth Night." The production was most conspicuous by its lack of the amateur style, usually so noticeable in such performances, and each player showed not only a thorough knowledge of his part, but a careful study of the interpretation of it. The manner of setting introduced to Portland by the Ben Great players was adopted, and changes in the scenery were indicated only by placards displayed at one side of the stage. There were industriously changed by pages Smith and Coe after each scene.

The real movement began with the entrance of Charles Robinson as Sir Toby Belch, who played the drunken kinsman to perfection. Roland Kennedy as the fool also made a hit, and when these two combined with Prescott Cookingham in the rowdy scene, the result was an uproarous confusion which would have pleased Bacchus himself.

Among the others, William Dolph as Malvolio pleased, giving the part a decided touch of originality. Others who pleased the immense audience present were Cecil Espy as Orsino, George Latimer as Sebastian, Mason Ehrman as Antonio, and Lovelle Winters as Fabian.

Anits Bennet as Olivia save a splendid representation of the lovesick lady. Maria was taken by Jean Brownile, and Viola by Lesife Smith. The performance was excellent throughout, and all those present look forward with pleasure to the club's next play.
