The Realm of Reminiscence

BY HELEN HAWTHORN

... mud and all, in her arms and almost smothered him—dirt and all—with kisses.

"Lots worse boys than you? Well, I should think so," and she kissed him until you could see that his face was white under the stains.

The other woman chimed in, and between them they nearly hugged the little lad to death.

The child's plea struck home. "Lots worse boys than you, Jay," with your innocent, child-face, and curls; with your great brown eyes that have caught the autumn tints in them.

"I should think there were, and let your mother hug you close while she can, and thank God that the only sins you bear will wash off with the trying."

There are many mothers who would weep agonized tears of gratitude to-night if there were no worse boys than you, little Jay.

Evils of Cigarette Smoking.

At Atlanta, Georgia, on April 2, a $30 Easter hat on the head of Miss Celeste Stanton caught fire while Whitehall street was crowded with shoppers.

The hat was destroyed, the young woman lost much hair, was scorched about the neck and face, and there was a panic in the shopping district.

A young man checked the conflagration by throwing his overcoat over the young woman's head. In the wreck of the hat was found the stub of a cigarette that had been dropped from an upper story window and had caused the catastrophe.

An inimitable style is manifest in the Hat that bears this label

THE NEW WAY TO DRINK IS BY INJECTION INTO THE ARM

To the man to whom the local option laws in his "dry" community present insurmountable obstacles in the way of quenching his continuous thirst, there is no longer need of him traveling into another less restricted county in order to secure a drink.

Under sanction of the highest medical authority in the world all the effort necessary on his part now is to purchase a bottle of alcohol at the drug store, a hypodermic syringe and have an attack of neuralgia, the latter either real or imagined. The alcohol has been pronounced an infallible cure for the neuralgia and the man with the thirst can thus have severe attacks at his times a week as convenient. With his bottle of alcohol handy and the injector ready—the neuralgia attack a secondary consideration—the toper can enjoy at his leisure the exhilarating influence of the fire water as he squirts it into his arm.

Only a few days ago at the meeting of the medical congress in Berlin, Dr. Schlosser, an eminent German physician whose discoveries before have brought him no little note, stated that after five years of experimenting he had found the best cure for neuralgia was the injection of alcohol. Under his own personal observation it had proved successful in 302 cases when all other remedies had failed.

RECKLESS YOUNGSTERS WITH GUNS SCARE PEOPLE ON TABOR HEIGHTS

People who live on Tabor heights complain of the shooting in the park site on the crest. They declare that it should be stopped by the city authorities, as the location is within the city limits. Boys and sometimes young men are in the habit of going up the hill with small weapons, 22-rifles and revolvers, and shooting promiscuously as if they were out alone in the timbered mountains instead of in the metropolis of the Pacific northwest. The residents are afraid to go outside their homes on account of this reckless practice that is allowed to go on.

Chinese pheasants are heard in the early morning in the park and there are numerous squirrels and small animals that afford an object for practice with small arms.

The summit of Mount Tabor is a very pretty place, and many people like to visit the place. Thousands journeyed to the mountain last Sunday and many would like to visit it during the week but for fear of their lives.

HENEY IS HERO OF THE HOUR AT SAN FRANCISCO

Speaks at Anniversary Banquet and is Given Ovation—Discusses Pure Government.

San Francisco, April 18.—At the banquet of the Merchants' association at the Fairmount hotel last night, which was the closing event of San Francisco's celebration of her rejuvenation on the first anniversary of the earthquake and fire, Francis J. Heney, the leading figure in the graft prosecution, was the hero of the hour. His speech at the banquet was frequently interrupted by enthusiastic cheers.

Heney said to the 1,000 men who were present that the people of San Francisco are now on trial before the nation to show whether they are of a high enough class to govern themselves properly. As it is not the buildings that make the city, so it is not the party that makes the government, said Heney. The question was whether the people possess high enough standards of more courage to meet dishonesty and root it out.

Heney declared that no person connected with the graft prosecution is inoculated with the desire to profit politically. He said that Spreckels had never had it and he himself had his political appendix removed in Arizona. He referred sarcastically to the large number of venemen draws for the Ruef trial who beseege Judge Dume with excuses in order to be relieved from serving.

Among other speakers at the banquet were Governor James N. Gillette, Toastmaster Symmes, C. B. Bentley, Bishop W. F. Nichols, and District Attorney Langdon. After the dinner had been served, Toastmaster Symmes pressed a button which lighted 2,400 electric bulbs, on the dome of the city hall.

TRIPLE MURDERER PAYS PENALTY IN DEATH CHAIR

Dr. Oliver Haugh is Electrocuted for the Murder of Parents and Brother.

(Journal Special Service.)

Columbus, O., April 18.—Dr. Oliver C. Haugh was electrocuted at the state penitentiary shortly after midnight this morning. The crime, the penalty for which he paid in the death chair, was the murder of his father, mother and brother at his father's home at Dayton on the night of November 4, 1905.

Dr. Haugh would say nothing and walked to the chair without assistance. He was a prominent physician of Dayton, but became addicted to the use of morphine. On the night of the murder he had purchased a quantity of poison. The bodies of the victims were incinerated in a fire that destroyed his father's house, where Haugh had gone to spend the night. He asserted at the trial that the fire had started from an unknown source and that he had nearly lost his own life in attempting to save his parents and brother. Later he adopted the insanity plea, but was convicted and sentenced to death. He was married and has a wife and two children living at Dayton.

"Lots Worse Boys."

His mother was sure that boys were harder to bring up than girls and she was telling a neighbor about her trials with the boy.

"You see he wants to be out-doors all the time, and in all kinds of weather," said the mother, "and he comes back at night looking like that." And she pointed the finger of scorn at a tattered, dirty little figure which tried to wriggle out of sight in the corner. They drew him out to have a look at him, says a writer in an exchange.

The tangled black hair might have belonged to a Hottentot, the torn clothes and the mud-splashed stockings suggested the London slums. One hand reached out and unconsciously tried to hide an enormous tear in the urchin's coat.

"Just see that!" exclaimed the tired mother, catching a view of the coat. "Did you ever? And his new suit, too. Dear me, Jay, how in the world did you manage to tear your coat so?"

"Why, mamma, I was running away from Jimmie the kid—he sells papers, you know—and he caught me and shook this piece out," here Jay revealed a gap in the garment which took his mother's breath away.

"Was there ever such a boy?" sighed the mother with a long-suffering gasp toward the visitor.

The child lifted his large brown eyes to the two women, gulped down a sob, and turning his face, down which the tears were slowly trickling, toward them, said with a suspicious trembling at the mouth: "Mamma, there's lots worse boys than me."

"Bless your dear, baby, so there are!" exclaimed the mother, as she stooped down to the tiny youngster, lifted him,

The New Coiffure.

From the Philadelphia Telegraph.

There are two important points to be chronicled about the curled coiffure, and the one most emphatically to be borne in mind is its remarkable width. The curls do not mount to an apex on high, but are worn fairly flat upon the crown of the head. Their mission is to emphasize the width of the head from ear to ear, and thus to be in keeping with the new spring millinery. Unfortunately it is a mode by no means universally becoming, hence this is the moment for making a careful study of individual requirements.

Supposing the face to be too round to insure for pronounced breadth, a real success, the curls are elongated down the back of the head, and the halo above the brow is raised in the center, instead of being greatly puffed out at the sides.

Then, again, instead of mounting the front hair to a great height, a very piquant effect above a face of small features, but fatal in the case of pronounced ones, it may be draped in the Regency manner over the brow, with the merest indication of a side parting. Or a study of the Spanish coiffure will suggest the picturesque manner in which the daughters of the south part and drape their heavy tresses low down upon the brow. Some few picturesque looking girls can with advantage to their appearance adopt the Greuze parting and the demurely childish-severed locks that fall down over the ears, with a curl or two escaping from them, but as a rule the "halo" or chapeau turned upward from the forehead is their best resource. One fact is quite clear with regard to the chapeaux of this season, namely, that additions to the coiffure, particularly in the form of clusters of pin curls, will be hugely in demand. Dyed tresses are not in vogue, and silver hair is to stand high in the estimation of lovers of beauty. Pale brown hair is modish, especially if there be a touch of chestnut in it. Transformations to cover the entire head, or to augment the already possessed tresses, have never been in greater request than now. One reason of this is that short, thick hair is necessary to produce the curled coiffure, and it is not always forthcoming.

A ribbon wound through and through the curls makes a prettier ornament than any other of the youthful, and to stimulate natural foliage are still in fashion, and so are circlets of small flowers, like roses, violets and daisies arranged in clumps with connecting links of dow-dropped velvet ribbon.
