SPEAKS OF FORCEFUL EXISTENCE OF THE SOUL

Father Sherman Lectures to Crowded Cathedral on This Subject.

In the second lecture of his series delivered last evening in the cathedral, Father Sherman began by speaking of the position of man in nature as determined by the faculties of his spiritual soul, not by his external or bodily nature. He dwelt at some length on the variety and splendor of the powers of the human soul, the epitome of all creation, and then proved analytically first that the soul is a substantial principle, the permanent abiding element of our being and the principle of identity testified to by our consciousness and our memory; second, that this substance is spiritual, though united to a material body. It is spiritual because mental and moral action are spiritual, because liberty, the God-like gift, is a spiritual power, and spiritual fruit can only grow on a spiritual trunk. Mind and will prove the soul to be a spirit.

Third, the soul is immortal because spiritual, because endowed with an innate tendency to happiness which is the mainspring of the higher life, a tendency which cannot be fulfilled saving to an existence where the soul enjoys its perfect and unending possession of absolute good.

The lecture concluded with a brief analysis of the difference between intellect and instinct. The cathedral was crowded.

The next lecture in this series is on the "Divinity of Christ," a subject of vital importance. It is considered one of Father Sherman's most successful and convincing talks.

Pay your west side gas bills before Friday, 4 p. m. Positively no discount after that day.
