If you haven't already phoned us, do so early this morning, saying how many plates you desire for this evening's dinner at our hotel. For several weeks the Sargent dining parlors, both public and private, have been almost overflowing each Sunday evening, and in some instances numbers of guests have been forced to wait their turn at the tables. This ought not to be, and would not happen if our friends would give us early information as to their determination to dine with us. It is well known now in all upper classes of society that the Sargent sets the best tables to be found on the north Pacific coast, a statement you will agree with after having partaken of one of our 75-cent Sunday evening dinners. The house is located at the corner of Grand and Hawthorne avenues and seven carlines pass the door for all parts of Portland. Anyway it is only 10 minutes' walk from the postoffice to the house and a great many people enjoy that little ramble across the Madison street bridge. Nichelas Sargent, famed from ocean to ocean, is the manager, and nearly everybody knows what that means.
