

IN PERIL ON PEAKS

Men Who Provided Illumination of Mounts St. Helens, Hood and Adams Spend Night on Snow in Temperature Far Below Freezing.

The average means of celebrating Independence Day is neither big nor novel enough to suit fastidious Portland, so just as a side issue to her celebration, she sweeps the snow off three giant mountains and illuminates the heavens from their peaks. It's the way Portland has acquired of doing things.

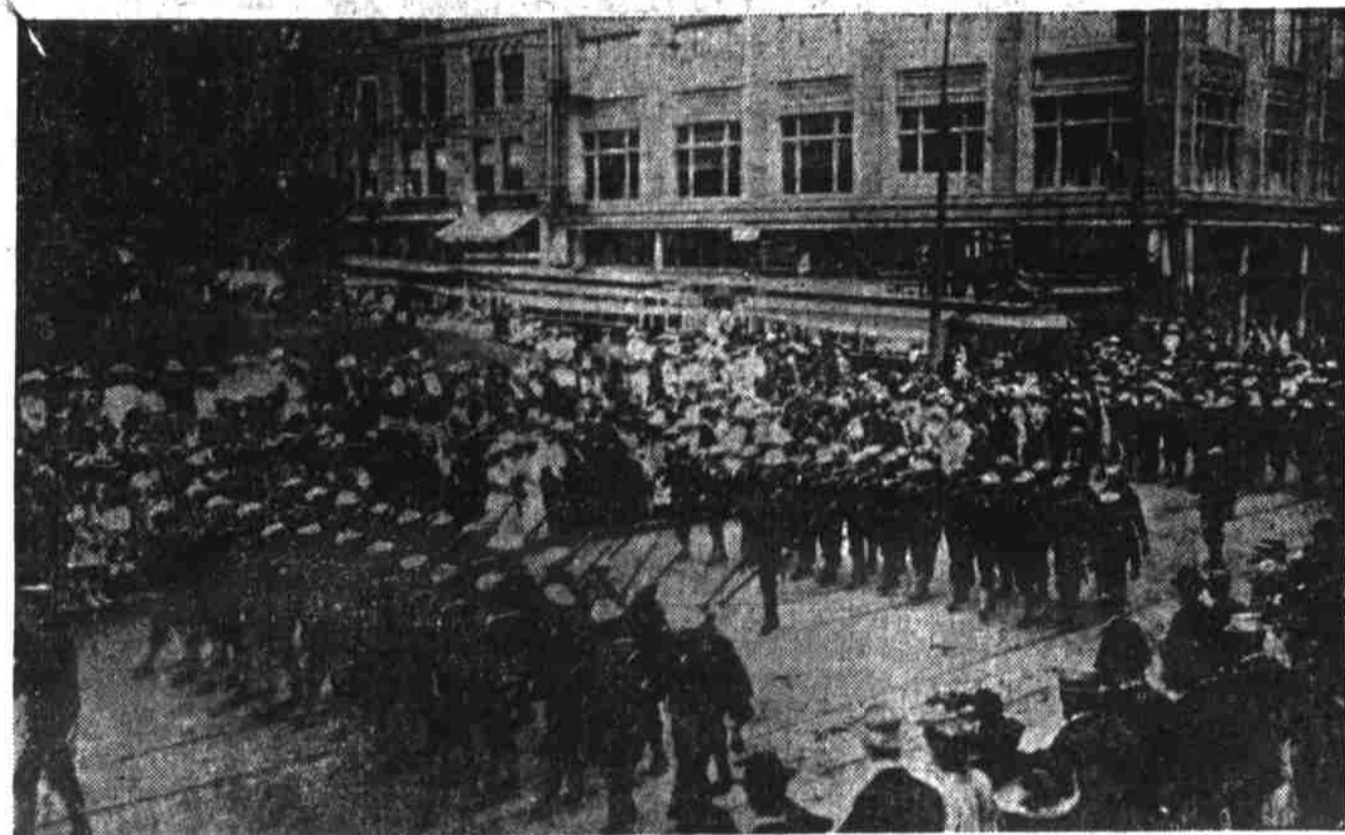

Shortly at 11 o'clock last night a great ball of fire, round and brilliant like a full-moon, appeared on the summit of Mt. Hood. Thousands of people in the city had been waiting for it and the mountain illumination came off exactly on schedule time. For full five minutes the great beacon light hung as if suspended in the sky then disappeared. Scarcely had it gone before a similar light appeared on the summit of St. Helens. It shone bright and brilliant for five minutes, then it also passed suddenly out of view. But even as it passed there appeared upon the top of Adams another ball of fire which illuminated the northeastern sky for the same length of time. The illumination of the three great peaks was a perfect success. Those who went out on the perilous task of helping to celebrate the Fourth evidently had no difficulty in reaching the summit of the mountains and their plans were carried out in full. The trip is considered extremely dangerous. There are frequent blizzards on the summit of the mountain and constant snow. Those who made the trip were forced to walk all night, fearing to sleep lest they be overcome by the cold. There are many other discomforts accompanying the journey. Each of the three parties took with them 100 pounds of powder to be used in the illumination. A space on the top of the mountain was cleared and the powder placed in position. Then a string of red fire is stretched around the powder and set off at two places simultaneously.

EIGHTEEN REPORT SUBSCRIPTIONS

Other Young People Lining Up Support Through Field Work.

ALASKAN TRIP FOR MANY FREE OF CHARGE

As Time Is Short Contestants Are Advised to Work Hard Right Along in Order to Win Valuable Scholarships Offered.

Up to the hour of five works yesterday 18 contestants reported subscriptions to The Journal and were allowed votes on them to count toward the award of scholarships and cash. Other young people have reported that they are at work gathering subscriptions and lining up support. Only 18 have actually obtained results. Field work is all very well and must be accomplished, but some of the promises made should be kept daily. Time is short in which to win the awards offered by The Journal, amounting in value to more than $5,000.

That Alaskan Trip. One contestant in each district standing highest on or about August 1 may send a friend to Alaska at the expense of The Journal. That privilege is worth working for. The Alaskan trip is said to be one of the finest on the American continent and many experienced travelers declare it to be the finest summer trip in the world. All expenses of excursionists will be paid by The Journal and appointees may leave their purses at home. It is entirely up to contestants to designate who shall make up this party. Districts from which leading contestants will choose follow: District No. 1, Multnomah county; district No. 2, Willamette valley, as far south as Eugene; district No. 3, Southern Oregon, all south of Eugene; district No. 4, eastern Oregon. Final Awards In Contest. Up to date 46 scholarships and $750 in cash are offered as The Journal's educational contest. With only 18 contestants heard from after the contest has been underway for one week, it looks as though there is plenty of room for others to enter. Those now in the contest need not think that they will have things all their own way for there are many ambitious boys and girls in Oregon and Washington who will not let The Journal's scholarships go begging.

Score Comes Tomorrow. Tomorrow the score of contestants who have reported subscriptions to date will be printed. In all contests it is said much depends on the start. But it is equally true much, if not more, depends upon endurance.
