BLOWS UP SHIP TO KILL ENEMY

niggler Lights Powder and Calmly Waits for Death Aboard Vessel.

(Journal Special Service.) Paris, July 6 .- The circumstances under which the mysterious ship, the captain of which was Moftal El Matari, a Tripoli smuggler, was blown up off the coast of Tunis late on Tuesday night are as dramatic as they were tragic.

The vessel, a brigantine, belonged to Chedrif Ben Mohrah of Tripoli, and was bringing from the Piraeus, 600 barrels of powder and a considerable number of cases of arms, as contraband.

The captain made several attempts to land on the coast of Tripoli on Monday and Tuesday, but was prevented by the coast guards, who were keeping a sharp lookout. He then stood to sea, and made for the coast of Tunis.

Here the ship was sighted by Choucha, a Tunisian coast guard belonging to Zargis, who at once sent 30 boats manned by 100 men—mostly fishers—in pursuit. Tripbli smuggler, was blown up off the pursuit.

The smaller craft stole under the court of darkness through the silent eas, intending to lie back till sunrise, when a formal demand for "surrender" would be made. They were observed, however, by the ever-vigilant smugger.

Four French Spahis thereupon stood up, and demanded instant capitulation.

"I am carrying a carso of powder. up, and demanded instant capitulation.
"I am carrying a cargo of powder.
You are helpless. Your lives are in my hands," was the captain's answer, and he swung a lighted torch over a dozen casks of powder which stood below.
"If the coast guard Choucha wants to talk to me." he shouted through his palms, "let him come on board, but at the first step I'll send them all to kingdom come."

dom come."

Choucha, thinking the threat mere bluster, called upon his men to board the smuggier. No sooner did the men appear on a line with the deck, however, than Captain Matari, brandishing the torch, shouted: "You have asked for it. Here it is."

for it. Here it is."

He then threw the brand into the bow of the vessel, and calmly folded his arms across his breast.

The explosion which followed was terrific. The vessel and nearly all the boats near it were blown into the air. A huge volume of water, like a tidal wave, swept to the shere, carrying in its track a number of people, six of whom were drowned.

His wallet and a few diamonds were missing, but the safe was unrifled, and it is believed that the murderer must have been surprised in his search for booty been surprised in his search for booty and have hastily decamped.

Earlier in the afternoon Mr. Bauer stated that he had an appointment at his office later. His seat commanded a view of the door of his office, so that no one could have entered that way without his notice. Further, a novel was found face down on the desk, which strengthens the indications that Mr. Bauer was not caught by surprise. Bauer was not caught by surprise.

The police are quite baffled at present to find any trace of the murderer.
